

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

[1732—1799]

EDWIN A. ALDERMAN

THE Washingtons were English people of good stock and gentle breeding. George Washington, whose character and achievements have set apart and forever ennobled the name, was the youngest child of Augustine Washington and his second wife, Mary Ball. Lawrence Washington, the grandfather of George, had come to Virginia in the days of Cromwell, in 1657, and Augustine, the father of George, was born in Virginia in 1694. He was married twice, and died in 1743, on the day before the birth of Thomas Jefferson, destined to be the great co-laborer of his son. Washington was born at Wakefield, Westmoreland County, Virginia, on February 22, 1732, in a modest but attractive home down near the water. The date of George Washington's birth might be taken very well as a sort of dividing line between the period of stationary and fixed colonialism and that period of growing self-satisfaction and contentment in America which ultimately led to self-assertion, revolution, and the establishment of a new country. Westmoreland County itself was famous then and more famous in later days, for the remarkable breed of men it produced, among others the Washingtons, the Monroes and the Lees. The very year after Washington's birth, the family moved to Mount Vernon, where, ten years afterward, Augustine Washington, the father, died. Because of the cares thus thrown upon Mrs. Washington, it seemed best to send their youngest son, George, to live with his half-brother, Augustine. The affairs of the family must have been prosperous, for in the two years succeeding the death of Augustine Washington, the Mount Vernon mansion was built. Immediately after its completion, however, for some reason perhaps connected with the education of her children, Mrs. Washington moved to Fredericksburg, and there her youngest son, George Washington, joined her, for the purpose of attending school. In 1746, his great desire seems to have been to enter the British Navy, and one is tempted to speculate as to what might have been the turn of affairs in America if George Washington, instead of figuring as leader of the American forces, had figured as admiral of the British fleet. He was deterred, however, from entering the Navy by the solicitude and solicitations of his mother, and in 1748, at the age of sixteen, became a surveyor. He was denied the advantages of college and university education, and was driven to find his training for life in the great university of outdoor life, and to sharpen his own wits by contact with the shrewd pioneers of the Atlantic seaboard. One year after he entered upon what might be called his profession, he was made public surveyor, and in this way was brought into contact with a number of prominent Virginians, notably the family of Fairfax, which still retains the English title of lord. The interesting little stories told of Washington at this time indicate that he must have been a full-blooded, hearty, handsome young fellow, paying much attention to his person and his manners, and proving immensely attractive to the young ladies, both of Greenway Court and of other homes where he was cordially welcomed.

By his nineteenth year, he had changed his profession from that of surveyor to that of soldier, and in 1751 was a major on the frontier. He turned aside from his military duties to devote himself to nursing his brother Lawrence, whom the doctors had sent to the Barbados. Nothing, however, could be done to restore Lawrence Washington's rapidly declining health, and after a few months he died, leaving George Washington, his youngest brother, as one of the executors of the estate, and, in the event that his own son did not live, heir to Mount Vernon. It was in this way that the property so intimately identified with the name of Washington came into his possession.

In 1752, he was promoted to adjutant-general, and was then sent on a mission to the frontier, and by 1754 was a lieutenant-colonel of militia. His success in military affairs, as symbolized by these rapid promotions, found a very sudden arrest in the signal failure of the Great Meadows campaign. The letters written immediately after this campaign to his brothers show with what humiliation he looked upon the unnecessary defeat of himself and his untrained followers. It was perhaps this sense of his own lack of military training that made him accept, with unqualified gratitude, the appointment of aide-de-camp to General Braddock, from whom he hoped to learn the art of war. In sequence to this appointment, he was made commander-in-chief of the Virginia forces, and sent on a military commission to New York. Because there was no need of his immediate services, in 1758 he resigned his commission, with the devout expectation of being able to retire to private life, for he had wooed and won Martha Custis, (née Dandridge), and was anxious to consummate this engagement, and lead his bride to his Mount Vernon home. This marriage took place in 1759, the very year in which England was reestablishing her strength on this side of the Atlantic by the conquest of Canada, and balancing her Western possessions by the complete domination of India in the Far East. It is well to note, too, in view of the Eighteenth Century quality of Washington's literary style, that this date falls in the very year in which Dr. Johnson was writing Rasselas, and the literary style of England was receiving its distinct impress of sonorousness and, perhaps, verbosity.

In the year, too, of his marriage, came his first civil duties, for he was elected a member of the House of Burgesses. For nearly ten years, from 1759 to 1769, he was permitted to remain quietly at his beautiful home, making his periodical trips to Williamsburg, to attend the sessions of the House of Burgesses, and being employed in 1769 as commissioner to settle the accounts of the colony. In 1770 he went on a long journey on the Ohio and Kanawha rivers, exploring a country with which he had already become in part familiar, and, no doubt, giving careful attention to his cherished plan of connecting the rivers of this Western border with the Atlantic ocean. In 1774, he was a member of the Virginia convention concerned in discussing the points at issue between England and Virginia, and in the same year was made a member of the First Continental Congress. He was continued in this office during its second term, and on June 15, 1775, was unanimously selected as commander-in-chief of the American forces, for it had already become apparent that the points at issue would never be settled save by an appeal to arms.

He began his actual military duties on July 3, 1775, in Cambridge, Massachusetts, just one year and a day before the famous Declaration of Independence, which committed the entire country to the war he himself would carry to a successful conclusion. On December 27, 1776, he was invested with absolute dictatorial powers, but used them with moderation and reserve, and with absolute disregard of self-aggrandizement.

The most dramatic episode of that war to him was, perhaps, the treason of his friend Benedict Arnold, in whom he had reposed unusual confidence, and to whom he had given large powers. The story of that war is too familiar now to be retold. Its hardships brought out the sterling qualities of Washington, as perhaps nothing else could have done, and when Cornwallis, in 1781, surrendered, Washington's fame as a soldier had been eternally fixed. Nevertheless, there were rumors of threatened sedition, and unabashed talk of an American dictator—rumors and threats that were absolutely quieted by Washington's retirement, on Christmas eve of 1783, to his Mount Vernon home. In 1784, he made another journey to the Western country, toward which he seemed to feel a constant drawing. In fact, throughout his life, the permanent place of his attachment was Mount Vernon, but the incessant call to his adventurous nature came from the mountains of the Alleghanies and the valleys of the Western rivers.

In spite of his desire to remain a private citizen, he was left at home but a short four years, when, in 1787, he was made president of the Constitutional Convention, and, on April 30, 1789, President of the United States. He had given eight years of his life to the military service of his country, and he was now called to eight years of service in civil capacity. It was during his first administration that he made his journey through the Southern States, and spoke, with evident pride, of the fact that he had accomplished the trip of two thousand miles in the short time of three months. After serving his second term, from 1793 to 1796, he delivered his farewell address to America, and found himself again at home in his beloved Mount Vernon. Rumors of prospective war with England made it necessary for the people to turn to Washington to lead them out of these new troubles, as he had led them before, through the wilderness of their own uncertainties and confusions, and on July 3, 1798—the anniversary of the date on which he had once before assumed the duties of commander-in-chief—he was again made commander-in-chief of the American forces. But he did not enter actively upon the duties, for the rumors were not yet confirmed; and on December 14, 1799, he died of laryngitis and bad medical attention, and was buried in the simple vault which he himself had supervised, within easy reach of his own home.

This story of Washington's life does not indicate, of course, the reason for including him in a library of Southern literature. But a careful examination of the fourteen large volumes devoted to his letters, messages and addresses, indicates that at least in quantity, he was no small contributor to the literary work of the Eighteenth Century. Nor can one, after such an examination, speak with disparagement of the quality of his work. It is true that Washington had never had the careful academic, scholastic education of the literary men of his own century, but it is also true that his first-hand experience with nature and with men, and the responsibilities thrown upon his willing shoulders, rendered his mind unusually alert and incisive, and gave to his utterances an earnestness and dignity which attract and hold attention. There may be, and perhaps there often is, a lack of directness and simplicity in his style, but it is not due to him, but to the age in which he lived, when men seemed to covet for their writings a certain show of loftiness and elevation, and a certain love for the amplified style as necessary to good literature. From the very first recorded letter, however, until the last; from the first public speech to the last farewell address, there is a uniformity of clear, clean thinking and earnest, intense expression, which do credit to his head and heart alike. Men in his day lived more by maxims and rules than in ours, perhaps, and while the wisdom inculcated in Washington's letters is generally that of common prudence and simple observation, now and then there is apparent the clear, distinct note of a lofty idealism, springing from his profound spiritual nature.

It is absurd to attempt to apply to the writings of George Washington the sort of technical criticism that one might apply to the work of a rhetorician or of a literary artist. Washington earned his place in literature by the might of his character and his deeds. His writings flowed out of his life and are generally tasks imposed upon him in the discharge of great duties. Naturally they reflect the elements of his sincere and ample nature, and, therefore, have achieved greatness as literature because informed with the stately dignity of a great soul. One cannot read the Farewell Address, for instance, in a thoughtful mood, without genuine and lofty emotion. The words of this writer are the words of the creator of a new nation now grown into the colossal Republic of the West. We do not discern in them the classic simplicity of Cæsar, or the fiery eloquence of Napoleon, or the meditative philosophy of Marcus Aurelius. His style, like his character, is high, serious, balanced, purposeful; but back of the style always is the man. When one thinks of the unsullied career of George Washington as a soldier, a statesman, a patriot; when one reflects upon the antique virtues of the man, causing him to fall easily, as of right, into the company of the Alfreds and Godfreys and Leonidas, one is the more inclined to cling to the ancient faith of an overruling Providence guiding the affairs of nations. This democratic experiment needed the constructive, practical genius of Hamilton, the philosophic acumen, the faith in men, and the amazing versatility of Jefferson, but it needed then and now needs most sorely as its foundation stone, the white granite character of George Washington. Jefferson and Hamilton were his friends. It was a sheer moral achievement that enabled him to keep both of them for friends. Doubtless those two great men, patriots and leaders as they were, lightning-minded, cultivated, cosmopolitan, found the father of his country sometimes dull, but I have a feeling that they never looked at him without knowing that they were in the presence of their master, and, furthermore, without feeling that they were in the presence of one of the supreme figures in the annals of their race. Their gifted imaginations must have taught them that neither Alexander nor Cæsar nor Charlemagne had to his credit any result of work so rapid, so stupendous, so enduring, as did this quiet, self-controlled man. The generations have raised to him a great monument of impassioned oratory, but the essence of it all may be stated in this sentence. Character is greater than genius.

In a noble rhapsody about Napoleon, Heinrich Heine declared that in his brain the eagles of inspiration built their eyries, and in his heart hissed the serpent of ambition. Neither an eagle nor a serpent could ever figure in any analogy descriptive of the life and deeds of George Washington. He is simply a great illuminating allegory of unselfishness, patience, self-control, and character. Frederick Harrison, a thoughtful Englishman, justly summarizes and appraises the man who parted the colonies from the mother land:

"The grand endowment of Washington was character, not imagination; judgment, not subtlety; not brilliancy, but wisdom. The wisdom of Washington was the genius of common sense, glorified into unerring truth of view. He had that courage, physical and moral, that purity of soul, that cool judgment which is bred in the bone of the English-speaking race. But in Washington these qualities, not rare on either side of the Atlantic, were developed to a supreme degree and were found in absolute perfection. He thus became the transfiguration of the stalwart, just, truthful, prudent citizen, having that essence of good sense which amounts to true genius, that perfection of courage which is true heroism, that transparent unselfishness which seems to us the special mark of the saint."

To these modern ages George Washington has become, in all lands, the apostle of noble character preaching in his life and in his grave utterances the high doctrine that immortal fame and immeasurable service may be rendered more enduringly by integrity, honor, and the quiet virtues, than by eloquence, or logic, or superhuman gifts.

'The Library of Southern Literature' started out with the purpose to reveal the soul of a distinctive and tragic section. It is a just and noble coincidence that its closing volume should contain words of solemn seriousness from a Virginia country gentleman, who became the great republican hero of America, and who embodies for all time the spiritual longings of the undivided Republic.

TO JOHN A. WASHINGTON

FORT CUMBERLAND, 18 July, 1755.

DEAR BROTHER:

As I have heard, since my arrival at this place, a circumstantial account of my death and dying speech, I take this early opportunity of contradicting the first, and of assuring you, that I have not as yet composed the latter. But, by the all-powerful dispensations of Providence, I have been protected beyond all human probability and expectation; for I had four bullets through my coat, and two horses shot under me, yet escaped unhurt, altho' death was levelling my companions on every side of me!

We have been most scandalously beaten by a trifling body of men, but fatigue and want of time will prevent me from giving you any of the details, until I have the happiness of seeing you at Mount Vernon, which I now most ardently wish for, since we are drove in thus far. A weak and feeble state of health obliges me to halt here for two or three days, to recover a little strength, that I may thereby be enabled to proceed homewards with more ease. You may expect to see me there on Saturday or Sunday se'night, which is as soon as I can well be down, as I shall take my Bullskin Plantations in my way. Pray give my compliments to all my friends. I am, dear Jack, your most affectionate brother.

ADDRESS TO THE OFFICERS OF THE VIRGINIA REGIMENT

8 January, 1756.

* * * * *

THIS timely warning of the effects of misbehavior will, I hope, be instrumental in animating the younger officers to a laudable emulation in the service of their country. Not that I apprehend any of them can be guilty of offences of this nature: but that there are many other misdemeanors, that will, without due circumspection, gain upon inactive minds, and produce consequences equally disgraceful.

I would, therefore, earnestly recommend, in every point of duty, willingness to undertake, and intrepid resolution to execute. Remember, that it is the actions, and not the commission, that make the officer, and that there is more expected from him, than the title. Do not forget, that there ought to be a time appropriated to attain this knowledge, as well as to indulge pleasure. And as we now have no opportunities to improve from example, let us read for this desirable end. There is Bland's and other treatises which will give the wished-for information.

I think it my duty, gentlemen, as I have the honour to preside over you, to give this friendly information; especially as I am determined, as far as my small experience in service, my abilities, and interest of the service may dictate, to observe the strictest discipline through the whole economy of my behavior. On the other hand, you may as certainly depend upon having the strictest justice administered to all, and that I shall make it the most agreeable part of my duty to study merit, and reward the brave and deserving. I assure you, gentlemen, that partiality shall never bias my conduct, nor shall prejudice injure any; but, throughout the whole tenor of my proceedings, I shall endeavor, as far as I am able, to reward and punish, without the least diminution.

TO GEORGE MASON

MOUNT VERNON, 5 April, 1769.

DEAR SIR:

Herewith you will receive a letter and sundry papers, which were forwarded to me a day or two ago by Dr. Ross of Bladensburg, I transmit them with the greater pleasure, as my own desire of knowing your sentiments upon a matter of this importance exactly coincides with the Doctor's inclinations.

At a time, when our lordly masters in Great Britain will be satisfied with nothing less than the deprivation of American freedom, it seems highly necessary that something should be done to avert the stroke, and maintain the liberty, which we have derived from our ancestors. But the manner of doing it, to answer the purpose effectually, is the point in question.

That no man should scruple, or hesitate a moment, to use arms in defence of so valuable a blessing, on which all the good and evil of life depends, is clearly my opinion. Yet arms, I would beg leave to add, should be the last recourse, the dernier resort. Addresses to the throne, and remonstrances to Parliament, we have already, it is said, proved the inefficacy of. How far, then, their attention to our rights and privileges is to be awakened or alarmed, by starving their trade and manufactures, remains to be tried.

The northern colonies, it appears, are endeavoring to adopt this scheme. In my opinion it is a good one, and must be attended with salutary effects, provided it can be carried pretty generally into execution. But to what extent it is practicable to do so, I will not take upon me to determine. That there will be difficulties attending the execution of it everywhere, from clashing interests, and selfish, designing men (ever attentive to their own gain, and watchful of every turn, that can assist their lucrative views, in preference to every other consideration) cannot be denied; but in the tobacco colonies, where the trade is so diffused, and in a manner wholly conducted by factors for their principals at home, these difficulties are certainly enhanced, but I think not insurmountably increased, if the gentlemen in their several counties will be at some pains to explain matters to the people, and stimulate them to a cordial agreement to purchase none but certain enumerated articles out of any of the stores after such a period, nor import nor purchase any themselves. This, if it did not effectually withdraw the factors from their importations, would at least make them extremely cautious in doing it, as the prohibited goods could be vended to none but the non-associators, or those who would pay no regard to their association; both of whom ought to be stigmatized, and made the object of public reproach.

The more I consider a scheme of this sort, the more ardently I wish success to it, because I think there are private as well as public advantages to result from it—the former certain, however precarious the other may prove. For in respect to the latter, for I have always thought, that by virtue of the same power (for here alone the authority derives) which assumes the right of taxation, they may attempt at least to restrain our manufactories, especially those of a public nature, the same equity and justice prevailing in the one case as the other, it being no greater hardship to forbid my manufacturing, than it is to order me to buy goods of them loaded with duties, for the express purpose of raising a revenue. But as a measure of this sort would be an additional exertion of arbitrary power, we cannot be worsted, I think, by putting it to the test.

On the other hand, that the colonies are considerably indebted to Great Britain, is a truth universally acknowledged. That many families are reduced almost, if not quite, to penury and want from the low ebb of their fortunes, and estates daily selling for the discharge of debts, the public papers furnish but too many melancholy proofs of, and that a scheme of this sort will contribute more effectually than any other I can devise to emerge the country from the distress it at present labors under, I do most firmly believe, if it can be generally adopted. And I can see but one set of people (the merchants excepted,) who will not, or ought not, to wish well to the scheme, and that is those who live genteelly and hospitably on clear estates. Such as these, were they not to consider the valuable object in view, and the good of others, might think it hard to be curtailed in their living and enjoyments. For as to the penurious man, he saves his money and he saves his credit, having the best plea for doing that, which before, perhaps, he had the most violent struggles to refrain from doing. The extravagant and expensive man has the same good plea to retrench his expenses. He is thereby furnished with a pretext to live within bounds, and embraces it. Prudence dictated economy to him before, but his resolution was too weak to put it in practice. For how can I, says he, who have lived in such and such a manner, change my method? I am ashamed to do it, and besides, such an alteration in the system of my living will create suspicion of the decay of my fortune, and such a thought the world must not harbor. I will e'en continue my course, till at last the course discontinues the estate, a sale of it being the consequence of his perseverance in error. This I am satisfied is the way, that many, who have set out in the wrong track, have reasoned, till ruin stares them in the face. And in respect to the poor and needy man, he is only left in the same situation that he was found—better, I might say, because, as he judges from comparison, his condition is amended in proportion as it approaches nearer to those above him.

Upon the whole, therefore, I think the scheme a good one, and that it ought to be tried here, with such alterations as the exigency of our circumstances renders absolutely necessary. But how, and in what manner to begin the work, is a matter worthy of consideration, and whether it can be attempted with propriety or efficacy (further than a communication of sentiments to one another,) before May, when the Court and Assembly will meet in Williamsburg, and a uniform plan can be concerted, and sent into the different counties to operate at the same time and in the same manner everywhere, is a thing I am somewhat in doubt upon, and should be glad to know your opinion of.

ANSWER TO AN ADDRESS OF THE PROVINCIAL CONGRESS OF MASSACHUSETTS

GENTLEMEN :

4 July, 1775.

Your kind congratulations on my appointment and arrival, demand my warmest acknowledgments, and will be ever retained in grateful remembrance.

In exchanging the enjoyments of domestic life for the duties of my present honorable but arduous station, I only emulate the virtue and public spirit of the whole province of the Massachusetts Bay, which, with a firmness and patriotism without example in modern history, have sacrificed all the comforts of social and political life, in support of the rights of mankind, and the welfare of our common country. My highest ambition is to be the happy instrument of vindicating those rights, and to see this devoted province again restored to peace, liberty and safety.

The short space of time, which has elapsed since my arrival, does not permit me to decide upon the state of the army. The course of human affairs forbids an expectation that troops formed under such circumstances should at once possess the order, regularity, and discipline of veterans. Whatever deficiencies there may be, will, I doubt not, soon be made up by the activity and zeal of the officers, and the docility and obedience of the men. These qualities, united with their native bravery and spirit, will afford a happy presage of success, and put a final period to those distresses, which now overwhelm this once happy country.

I most sincerely thank you, Gentlemen, for your declaration of readiness at all times to assist me in the discharge of the duties of my station. They are so complicated and extended, that I shall need the assistance of every good man, and lover of his country. I therefore repose the utmost confidence in your aid.

In return for your affectionate wishes to myself, permit me to say, that I earnestly implore that divine Being, in whose hands are all human events, to make you and your constituents as distinguished in private and public happiness, as you have been by ministerial oppression, and private and public distress.

TO THE INHABITANTS OF THE ISLAND OF BERMUDA

CAMP AT CAMBRIDGE, 3 miles from Boston,

6 September, 1775.

GENTLEMEN:

In the great conflict, which agitates this continent, I cannot doubt but the assertors of freedom and the right of the constitution are possessed of your most favorable regards and wishes for success. As descendants of freemen, and heirs with us of the same glorious inheritance, we flatter ourselves that, though divided by our situation, we are firmly united in sentiment. The cause of virtue and liberty is confined to no continent or climate. It comprehends, within its capacious limits, the wise and good, however dispersed and separated in space or distance.

You need not be informed, that the violence and rapacity of a tyrannic ministry have forced the citizens of America, your brother colonists into arms. We equally detest and lament the prevalence of those counsels, which have led to the effusion of so much blood, and left us no alternative, but a civil war, or a base submission. The wise Dispenser of all events has hitherto smiled upon our virtuous efforts. Those mercenary troops, a few of whom lately boasted of subjugating this vast continent, have been checked in their earliest ravages, and are now actually encircled in a small space, their arms disgraced, and suffering all the calamities of a siege. The virtue, spirit, and union of the provinces leave them nothing to fear, but the want of ammunition. The applications of our enemies to foreign states, and their vigilance upon our coasts, are the only efforts they have made against us with success. Under these circumstances, and with these sentiments, we have turned our eyes to you, Gentlemen, for relief. We are informed there is a very large magazine on your island under a very feeble guard. We would not wish to involve you in an opposition in which, from your situation, we should be unable to support you; we know not, therefore, to what extent to solicit your assistance in availing ourselves of this supply; but, if your favor and friendship to North America and its liberties have not been misrepresented, I persuade myself you may, consistently with your own safety, promote and further this scheme, so as to give to it the fairest prospect of success. Be assured, that, in this case, the whole power and exertion of my influence will be made with the Honorable Congress, that your island may not only be supplied with provisions, but experience every mark of affection and friendship, which the grateful citizens of the free country can bestow on its brethren and benefactors.

TO COLONEL BENEDICT ARNOLD

INSTRUCTIONS

1. You are immediately on the march from Cambridge to take the command of the detachment from the Continental Army against Quebec, and use all possible expedition, as the winter season is now advancing, and the success of this enterprise, under God, depends wholly upon the spirit with which it is pushed, and the favorable dispositions of the Canadians and Indians.
2. When you come to Newburyport you are to make all possible inquiry, what men-of-war there may be on the coast, to which this detachment may be exposed on their voyage to Kennebec River; and, if you should find that there is danger of your being intercepted, you are not to proceed by water, but by land, taking care on the one hand not to be diverted by light and vague reports, and on the other not to expose the troops rashly to a danger, which by many judicious persons has been deemed very considerable.

3. You are, by every means in your power, to endeavor to discover the real sentiments of the Canadians towards our cause, and particularly as to this expedition, bearing in mind, that if they are averse to it and will not co-operate, or at least willingly acquiesce, it must fail of success. In this case you are by no means to prosecute the attempt; the expense of the expedition, and the disappointment, are not to be put in competition with the dangerous consequences, which may ensue from irritating them against us, and detaching them from their neutrality, which they have adopted.

4. In order to cherish those favorable sentiments to the American cause, that they have manifested, you are, as soon as you arrive in their country, to disperse a number of the addresses you will have with you, particularly in those parts, where your route shall lie; and observe the strictest discipline and good order, by no means suffering any inhabitant to be abused, or in any manner injured, either in his person or his property, punishing with exemplary severity every person, who shall transgress, and making ample compensation to the party injured.

5. You are to endeavor, on the other hand, to conciliate the affections of those people, and such Indians as you may meet with, by every means in your power; convincing them, that we come, at the request of many of their principal people, not as robbers or to make war upon them, but as the friends and supporters of their liberties as well as ours. And to give efficacy to these sentiments, you must carefully inculcate upon the officers and soldiers under your command, that, not only the good of their country, but their safety, depends upon the treatment of these people.

6. Check every idea and crush in its earliest stage every attempt to plunder even those, who are known to be enemies to our cause. It will create dreadful apprehension in our friends, and, when it is once begun, no one can tell where it will stop. I therefore again most expressly order, that it be discouraged and punished in every instance without distinction.

7. Any King's stores, which you shall be so fortunate to possess yourself of, are to be secured for the Continental use, agreeably to the rules and regulations of war published by the honorable Congress. The officers and men may be assured that any extraordinary service performed by them will be suitably rewarded.

8. Spare neither pains nor expense to gain all possible intelligence of your march, to prevent surprises and accidents of every kind, and endeavor if possible to correspond with General Schuyler, so that you may act in concert with him. This, I think, may be done by means of the St. Francis Indians.

9. In case of a union with General Schuyler, or if he should be in Canada upon your arrival there, you are by no means to consider yourself as upon a separate and independent command, but are to put yourself under him and follow his directions. Upon this occasion, and all others, I recommend most earnestly to avoid all contentions about rank. In such a cause every post is honorable, in which a man can serve his country.

10. If Lord Chatham's son should be in Canada, and in any way should fall into your power, you are enjoined to treat him with all possible deference and respect. You cannot err in paying too much honor to the son of so illustrious a character, and so true a friend to America. Any other prisoners, who may fall into your hands, you will treat with as much humanity and kindness, as may be consistent with your own safety and public interest. Be very particular in restraining, not only your own troops, but the Indians, from all acts of cruelty and insult, which will disgrace the American arms, and irritate our fellow subjects against us.

11. You will be particularly careful to pay the full value for all provisions, or other accommodations, which the Canadians may provide for you on your march. By no means press them or any of their cattle into your service, but amply compensate those, who voluntarily assist you. For this purpose you are provided with a sum of money in specie, which you will use with as much frugality and economy, as your necessities and good policy will admit, keeping as exact an account as possible of your disbursements.

12. You are by every opportunity to inform me of your progress, your prospects, and intelligence, and upon any important occurrence to send an express.

13. As the season is now far advanced, you are to make all possible despatch; but if unforeseen difficulties should arise, or if the weather should become so severe, as to render it hazardous to proceed, in your own judgment and that of your principal officers, whom you are to consult—in that case you are to return, giving me as early notice as possible, that I may render such assistance as may be necessary.

14. As the contempt of the religion of a country by ridiculing any of its ceremonies, or affronting any of its ministers or votaries, has ever been deeply resented, you are to be particularly careful to restrain every officer and soldier from such imprudence and folly, and to punish every instance of it. On the other hand, as far as lies in your power, you are to protect and support the free exercise of the religion of the country, and the undisturbed enjoyment of the rights of conscience in religious matters, with your utmost influence and authority.

Given under my hand, at headquarters, Cambridge, this 14th day of September, 1775.

TO MISS PHYLLIS WHEATLEY

MISS PHYLLIS:

CAMBRIDGE, 28 February, 1776.

Your favor of the 26th of October did not reach my hands, till the middle of December. Time enough, you will say, to have given an answer ere this. Granted. But a variety of important occurrences, continually interposing to distract the mind and withdraw the attention, I hope will apologize for the delay, and plead my excuse for the seeming but not real neglect. I thank you most sincerely for your polite notice of me, in the elegant lines you enclosed and however undeserving I may be of such encomium and panegyric, the style and manner exhibit a striking proof of your poetical talents; in honor of which, and as a tribute justly due to you, I would have published the poem, had I not been apprehensive, that while I only meant to give the world this new instance of your genius, I might have incurred the imputation of vanity. This, and nothing else, determined me not to give it place in the public prints.

If you should ever come to Cambridge, I shall be happy to see a person so favored by the Muses, and to whom nature has been so liberal and beneficent in her dispensations, I am, with great respect, your obedient humble servant.

ANSWER TO AN ADDRESS FROM THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF MASSACHUSETTS

GENTLEMEN :

I return you my most sincere and hearty thanks for your polite address; and feel myself called upon by every principle of gratitude, to acknowledge the honor you have done me in this testimonial of your approbation of my appointment to the exalted station I now fill, and, what is more pleasing, of my conduct in discharging its important duties. When the councils of the British nation had formed a plan for enslaving America, and depriving her sons of their most sacred and invaluable privileges, against the clearest remonstrances of the constitution, of justice, and of truth, and, to execute their schemes, had appealed to the sword, I esteemed it my duty to take a part in the contest, and more especially on account of my being called thereto by the unsolicited suffrages of the representatives of a free people; wishing for no other reward, than that rising from a conscientious discharge of the important trust, and that my services might contribute to the establishment of freedom and peace, upon a permanent foundation, and merit the applause of my countrymen, and every virtuous citizen.

Your acknowledgment of my attention to the civil constitution of this colony, whilst acting in the line of my department, also demands my grateful thanks. A regard to every Provincial institution, where not incompatible with the common interest, I hold a principle of duty and of policy, and it shall ever form a part of my conduct. Had I not learnt this before, the happy experiences of the advantages resulting from a friendly intercourse with your honorable body, their early and ready concurrence to aid and to counsel, whenever called upon in cases of difficulty and emergency, would have taught me the useful lesson.

That the metropolis of your colony is now relieved from the cruel and oppressive invasions of those, who were sent to erect the standard of lawless domination, and to trample on the rights of humanity, and is again open and free for its rightful possessors, must give pleasure to every virtuous and sympathetic heart; and its being effected without the blood of our soldiers and fellow-citizens must be ascribed to the interposition of that Providence, which has manifestly appeared in our behalf through the whole of this important struggle, as well as to the measures pursued for bringing about the happy event.

May that Being, who is powerful to save, and in whose hands is the fate of nations, look down with an eye of tender pity and compassion upon the whole of the United Colonies; may He continue to smile upon their counsels and arms, and crown them with success, whilst employed in the cause of virtue and mankind. May this distressed colony and its capital, and every part of this wide extended continent, through His divine favor, be restored to more than their former lustre and once happy state, and have peace, liberty, and safety secured upon a solid, permanent, and lasting foundation.

GENERAL WASHINGTON'S PROCLAMATION

WHEREAS several persons, inhabitants of the United States of America, influenced by inimical motives, intimidated by the threats of the enemy, or deluded by a Proclamation issued the 30th of November last, by Lord and General Howe, styled the King's Commissioners for granting pardons, &c. (now at open war, and invading these States), have been so lost to the interest and welfare of their country, as to repair to the enemy, sign a declaration of fidelity, and in some instances have been compelled to take the oath of allegiance, and engaged not to take up arms, or encourage others to do so, against the King of Great Britain; And whereas it has become necessary to distinguish between the friends of America and those of Great Britain, inhabitants of these States; and that every man who receives protection from, and as a subject of any State, not being conscientiously scrupulous against bearing arms, should stand ready to defend the same against hostile invasion; I do therefore, in behalf of the United States, by virtue of the powers committed to me by Congress, hereby strictly command and require every person, having subscribed such declaration, taken such oath, and accepted such protection and certificate, to repair to Head-Quarters, or to the quarters of the nearest general officer of the Continental Army, or militia, until further provision can be made by the civil authority, and there deliver up such protection, certificate, and passports, and take the oath of allegiance to the United States of America; nevertheless hereby granting full liberty to all such as prefer the interest and protection of Great Britain to the freedom and happiness of their country, forthwith to withdraw themselves and families within the enemy's lines. And I do hereby declare, that all and every person, who may neglect and refuse to comply with this order, within thirty days from the date hereof, will be deemed adherents to the King of Great Britain, and treated as common enemies to these American States.

Given at Head-Quarters, Morristown, this 25th day of January, 1777.

TO BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, IN PARIS

HEAD-QUARTERS, 17 August, 1777.

SIR:

I have been honored with your favor of the 2d of April by Monsieur de Cenis, written in behalf of that gentleman on the credit of Monsieur Turgot's recommendation. I should have been happy, had it been in my power, in deference to your recommendation, founded upon that of so respectable a character as Monsieur Turgot, to afford Monsieur de Cenis the encouragement to which his zeal and trouble in coming to America to offer his services give him a claim to; but such is the situation of things in our army at this time, that I am necessarily deprived of that satisfaction. Our troops being already formed and fully officered, and the number of foreign gentlemen already commissioned and continually arriving with fresh applications, throw such obstacles in the way of any future appointments, that every new arrival is only a new source of embarrassment to Congress and myself, and of disappointment and chagrin to the gentlemen, who come over. Had there been only a few to provide for, we might have found employment for them in a way advantageous to the service and honorable to themselves; but, as they have come over in such crowds, we either must not only employ them, or we must do it at the expense of one-half of the officers of the army; which you must be sensible would be attended with the most ruinous effects, and could not fail to occasion a general discontent. It is impossible for these gentlemen to raise men for themselves; and it would be equally impolite and unjust to displace others, who have been at all the trouble and at considerable expense in raising corps, in order to give them the command. Even where vacancies happen, there are always those, who have a right of succession by seniority, and who are as tenacious of this right as of the places they actually hold; and in this they are justified by the common principle and practice of all armies, and by resolution of Congress. Were these vacancies to be filled by the foreign officers, it would not only cause the resignation of those, who expect to succeed to them, but it would serve to disgust others, both through friendship to them, and from an apprehension of their being liable to the same inconvenience themselves. This, by rendering the hope of preferment precarious, would remove one of the principal springs of emulation, absolutely necessary to be upheld in an army.

Besides this difficulty, the error we at first fell into, of prodigally bestowing rank upon foreigners, without examining properly their pretensions, having led us to confer high ranks upon those who had none, or of a very inferior degree, in their own country, it now happens, that those who have really good pretensions, who are men of character, abilities, and rank, will not be contented unless they are introduced into some of the highest stations of the army, in which, it needs no arguments to convince you, it is impossible to gratify them. Hence this dissatisfaction and the difficulty of employing them are increased. These obstacles reduce us to this dilemma: either we must refuse to commission them at all, and leave all the expense, trouble, and risk, that have attended their coming over, uncompensated; or we must commission them without being able to incorporate or employ them; by which means enjoying the public pay and an unmeaning rank, they must submit to the mortification of being mere ciphers in the army. This last, to some of them, may not be disagreeable; but to men of sentiment, and who are actuated by a principle of honor and a desire to distinguish themselves, it must be humiliating and irksome in the extreme.

From these considerations it would be both prudent and just to discourage their coming over, by candidly opening the difficulties they have to encounter; and if, after that, they will persist in it, they can only blame themselves. I am sensible, Sir, that it is a delicate and perplexing task to refuse applications of persons patronized, (as I suppose often happens) by some of the first characters in the kingdom where you are, and whose favor it is of importance to conciliate; but I beg leave to suggest, whether it would not be better to do that, than by compliance to expose them to those mortifications, which they must unavoidably experience, and which they are too apt to impute to other causes than the true, and may represent under very disadvantageous colors. Permit me also to observe to you, that even where you do not promise anything, but simply give a line of recommendation, they draw as strong an assurance of success from that as from a positive engagement, and estimate the hardship of a disappointment nearly the same in one case as in the other. I am, &c.

TO BUSHROD WASHINGTON

DEAR BUSHROD: NEWBURG, 15 January, 1783.

You will be surprised, perhaps, at receiving a letter from me; but if the end is answered for which it is written, I shall not think my time misspent. Your father, who seems to entertain a very favorable opinion of your prudence, and I hope you merit it, in one or two of his letters to me speaks of the difficulty he is under to make you remittances. Whether this arises from the scantiness of his funds, or the extensiveness of your demands, is matter of conjecture with me. I hope it is not the latter; because common prudence, and every other consideration, which ought to have weight in a reflecting mind, is opposed to your requiring more than his conveniency, and a regard to his other children will enable him to pay; and because he holds up no idea in his Letter, which would support me in the conclusion. Yet when I take a view of the inexperience of youth, the temptations in the vices of cities, and the distresses to which our Virginia gentlemen are driven by an accumulation of Taxes and the want of a market, I am almost inclined to ascribe it in part to both. Therefore, as a friend, I give you the following advice.

Let the object, which carried you to Philadelphia, be always before your Eyes. Remember, that it is not the mere study of the Law, but to become eminent in the profession of it, which is to yield honor and profit. The first was your choice; let the second be your ambition, and that dissipation is incompatible with both; that the Company, in which you will improve most, will be least expensive to you; and yet I am not such a Stoic as to suppose that you will, or to think it right that you should, always be in Company with senators and philosophers; but of the young and juvenile kind let me advise you to be choice. It is easy to make acquaintances, but very difficult to shake them off, however irksome and unprofitable they are found, after we have once committed ourselves to them. The indiscretions and scrapes, which very often they voluntarily lead one into, prove equally distressing and disgraceful.

Be courteous to all, but intimate with few; and let those few be well tried before you give them your confidence. True friendship is a plant of slow growth, and must undergo and withstand the shocks of adversity before it is entitled to the appellation.

Let your heart feel for the afflictions and distresses of every one, and let your hand give in proportion to your purse; remembering always the estimation of the widow's mite, but, that it is not every one who asketh that deserveth charity; all however, are worthy of the inquiry, or the deserving may suffer.

Do not conceive that fine clothes make fine men any more than fine feathers make fine Birds. A plain genteel dress is more admired, and obtains more credit than lace and embroidery, in the Eyes of the judicious and sensible.

The last thing, which I shall mention, is first in importance; and that is to avoid Gaming. This is a vice which is productive of every possible evil; equally injurious to the morals and health of its votaries. It is the child of avarice, the brother of iniquity, and father of mischief. It has been the ruin of many worthy families, the loss of many a man's honor, and the cause of Suicide. To all those who enter the lists, it is equally fascinating. The successful gamester pushes his good fortune, till it is overtaken by a reverse. The losing gamester, in hopes of retrieving past misfortunes, goes on from bad to worse, till grown desperate he pushes at everything and loses his all. In a word, few gain by this abominable practice, (the profit if any being diffused) while thousands are injured.

Perhaps you will say, "My conduct has anticipated the advice," and "Not one of these cases applies to me." I shall be heartily glad of it. It will add not a little to my happiness, to find those to whom I am nearly connected pursuing the right walk of life. It will be the sure road to my favor, and to those honors and places of profit, which their Country can bestow; as merit rarely goes unrewarded. I am, dear Bushrod, your affectionate uncle.

ADDRESS TO THE OFFICERS

GENTLEMEN:

By an anonymous summons an attempt has been made to convene you together. How inconsistent with the rules of propriety, how unmilitary, and how subversive to all good order and discipline, let the good sense of the army decide.

In the moment of this summons, another anonymous production was sent into circulation; addressed more to the feelings and passions, than to the reason and judgment of the army. The author of the piece is entitled to such credit for the goodness of his pen, and I could wish he had as much credit for the rectitude of his heart; for, as men see through different optics, and are induced by the reflecting faculties of the mind to use different means to obtain the same end, the author of the address should have had more charity, than to mark for suspicion the man, who should recommend moderation and longer forbearance, or in other words, who should not think as he thinks, and act as he advises. But he had another plan in view, in which candor and liberality of sentiment, regard to justice, and love of country, have no part; and he was right to insinuate the darkest suspicion, to effect the blackest designs.

That the address is drawn with great art, and is designed to answer the most insidious purposes, that it is calculated to impress the mind with an idea of premeditated injustice in the sovereign power of the United States, and rouse all those resentments, which must unavoidably flow from such a belief; that the secret mover of this scheme, whoever he may be, intended to take advantage of the passions, while they were warmed by the recollection of past distresses, without giving time for cool, deliberate thinking, and that composure of mind which is so necessary to give dignity and stability to measures, is rendered too obvious by the mode of conducting the business, to need other proof than a reference to the proceeding.

Thus much, Gentlemen, I have thought it incumbent on me to observe to you, to show upon what principles I opposed the irregular and hasty meeting, which was proposed to be held on Tuesday last, and not because I wanted a disposition to give you every opportunity, consistent with your own honor and the dignity of the army, to make known your grievances. If my conduct heretofore has not evinced to you, that I have been a faithful friend to the army, my declaration of it at this time would be equally unavailing and improper. But, as I was among the first, who embarked in the cause of our common country; as I have never left your side one moment, but when called from you on public duty; as I have been the constant companion and witness of your distresses, and not among the last to feel and acknowledge your merits; as I have ever considered my own military reputation as inseparably connected with that of the army; as my heart has ever expanded with joy, when I have heard its praises, and my indignation has arisen, when the mouth of detraction has been opened against it; it can scarcely be supposed, at this stage of the war, that I am indifferent to its interests. But how are they to be promoted? The way is plain, says the anonymous address; if war continues, remove into the unsettled country; there establish yourselves, and leave an ungrateful country to defend itself. But whom are they to defend? Our wives, our children, our farms and other property, which we leave behind us? Or, in the state of hostile separation, are we to take the two first (the latter cannot be removed) to perish in a wilderness with hunger, cold, and nakedness? If peace takes place, neither sheathe your swords, says he, until you have obtained full and ample justice. This dreadful alternative, of either deserting our country in the extremest hour of distress, or turning our arms against it, which is the apparent object, unless Congress can be compelled into instant compliance, has something so shocking in it, that humility revolts at the idea. My God! What can this writer have in view by recommending such measures? Can he be a friend to the army? Can he be a friend to this country? Rather is he an insidious foe! Some emissary, perhaps from New York, plotting the ruin of both by sowing the seed of discord and separation between the civil and military powers of the continent? And what a compliment does he pay to our understandings, when he recommends measures, in either alternative, impracticable in their nature!

But here, Gentlemen, I will drop the curtain, because it would be as imprudent in me to assign my reasons for this opinion, as it would be insulting to your conception to suppose you stood in need of them. A moment's reflection will convince every dispassionate mind of the physical impossibility of carrying either proposal into execution.

There might, Gentlemen, be an impropriety in my taking notice, in this address to you, of an anonymous production; but the manner in which that performance has been introduced to the army, the effect it was intended to have, together with some other circumstances, will amply justify my observances on the tendency of that writing. With respect to the advice given by the author to suspect the man, who shall recommend moderate measures and longer forbearance, I spurn it, as every man who regards that liberty, and reveres that justice, for which we contend, undoubtedly must. For, if men are to be precluded from offering their sentiments on a matter which may involve the most serious and alarming consequences, that can invite the consideration of mankind, reason is of no use to us; the freedom of speech may be taken away, and, dumb and silent, we may be led away like sheep to the slaughter.

I cannot, in justice to my own belief, and what I have great reason to conceive is the intention of Congress, conclude this address without giving it as my decided opinion, that that honorable body entertain exalted sentiments of the services of the army, and, from a full conviction of its merits and sufferings, will do it complete justice. That their endeavors to discover, and establish funds for this purpose have been unwearied, and will not cease, till they have succeeded, I have no doubt; but, like all other large bodies, where there is a variety of different interests to reconcile, their deliberations are slow. Why then should we distrust them; and, in consequence of that distrust, adopt measures, which may cast a shade over that glory, which has been so justly acquired, and tarnish the reputation of an army, which is celebrated through all Europe for its fortitude and patriotism? And for what is this done? To bring the object we seek nearer? No! Most certainly, in my opinion, it will cast it at a greater distance.

For myself (and I take no merit in giving the assurance, being induced to it from principles of gratitude, veracity, and justice), a grateful sense of the confidence you have ever placed in me, a recollection of the cheerful assistance and prompt obedience I have experienced from you, under every vicissitude of fortune, and the sincere affection I feel for an army I have so long had the honor to command, oblige me to declare in this public and solemn manner, that, in the attainment of complete justice for all your toils and dangers, and in the gratification of every wish, so far as may be done consistently with the great duty I owe to my country, and those powers we are bound to respect, you may freely command my services to the utmost extent of my abilities.

While I give you these assurances and pledge myself in the most unequivocal manner to exert whatever ability I am possessed of in your favor, let me entreat you, Gentlemen, on your part, not to take any measures, which, in the calm light of reason, will lessen the dignity and sully the glory you have hitherto maintained. Let me request you to rely on the plighted faith of your country, and place a full confidence in the purity of the intentions of Congress, that, previous to your dissolution as an army, they will cause all your accounts to be liquidated, as directed in their resolutions, which were published to you two days ago, and that they will adopt the most effectual measures in their power to render ample justice to you for your faithful and meritorious services. And let me conjure you in the name of our common country, as you value your sacred honor, as you respect the rights of humanity, and as you regard the military and national character of America, to express your utmost horror and detestation of the man, who wishes, under any specious pretences, to overturn the liberties of our country, and who wickedly attempts to open the flood gates of civil discord, and deluge our rising empire in blood.

By thus determining and acting, you will pursue the plain and direct road to the attainment of your wishes; you will defeat the insidious designs of our enemies, who are compelled to resort from open to secret artifice; you will give one more distinguished proof of unexampled patriotism and patient virtue, rising superior to the pressure of the most complicated sufferings; and you will, by the dignity of your conduct, afford occasion for posterity to say, when speaking of the glorious example you have exhibited to mankind, "Had this day been wanting, the world had never seen the last stage of perfection, to which human nature is capable of attaining."

FAREWELL ORDERS TO THE ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES

ROCKY HILL, NEAR PRINCETON,
(Sunday) 2 November, 1783.

THE United States in Congress assembled, after giving the most honorable testimony to the merits of the federal armies, and presenting them with the thanks of their country for their long, eminent and faithful services, having thought proper, by their proclamation bearing date the 18th day of October last, to discharge such part of the troops as were engaged for the war, and to permit the officers on furlough to retire from service from and after to-morrow; which proclamation having been communicated in the public papers for the information and government of all concerned, it only remains for the Commander-in-chief to address himself once more, and that for the last time, to the armies of the United States (however widely dispersed the individuals who compose them may be), and to bid them an affectionate, a long farewell.

But before the Commander-in-chief takes his final leave of those he holds most dear, he wishes to indulge himself a few moments in calling to mind a slight review of the past. He will then take the liberty of exploring with his military friends their future prospects, of advising the general line of conduct, which, in his opinion, ought to be pursued; and he will conclude the address by expressing the obligations he feels himself under for the spirited and able assistance he has experienced from them, in the performance of an arduous office.

A contemplation of the complete attainment (at a period earlier than could have been expected) of the object, for which we contended against so formidable a power, cannot but inspire us with astonishment and gratitude. The disadvantageous circumstances on our part, under which the war was undertaken, can never be forgotten. The singular interpositions of Providence in our feeble condition were such, as could scarcely escape the attention of the most unobserving; while the unparalleled perseverance of the armies of the United States, through almost every possible suffering and discouragement for the space of eight long years, was little short of a standing miracle.

It is not the meaning nor within the compass of this address, to detail the hardships peculiarly incident to our service, or to describe the distresses, which in several instances have resulted from the extremes of hunger and nakedness, combined with the rigors of an inclement season; nor is it necessary to dwell on the dark side of our past affairs. Every American officer must now console himself for any unpleasant circumstances, which may have occurred, by a recollection of the uncommon scenes in which he has been called to act an inglorious part, and the astonishing events of which he has been a witness; events which have seldom, if ever before, taken place on the stage of human action; nor can they probably ever happen again. For who has before seen a disciplined army forced at once from such raw material? Who, that was not a witness, could imagine, that the most violent local prejudices would cease so soon; and that men, who came from the different parts of the continent, strongly disposed by the habits of education to despise and quarrel with each other, would instantly become but one patriotic band of brothers? Or who, that was not on the spot, can trace the steps by which such a wonderful revolution has been effected, and such a glorious period put to all our warlike toils?

It is universally acknowledged, that the enlarged prospects of happiness, opened by the confirmation of our independence and sovereignty, almost exceeds the power of description. And shall not the brave men, who have contributed so essentially to these inestimable acquisitions, retiring victorious from the field of war to the field of agriculture, participate in all the blessings, which have been obtained? In such a republic, who will exclude them from the rights of citizens, and the fruits of their labors? In such a country, so happily circumstanced, the pursuits of commerce and the cultivation of the soil will unfold to industry the certain road to competence. To those hardy soldiers, who are actuated by the spirit of adventure, the fisheries will afford ample and profitable employment; and the extensive and fertile regions of the West will yield a most happy asylum to those, who, fond of domestic enjoyment, are seeking for personal independence. Nor is it possible to conceive, that any one of the United States will prefer a national bankruptcy, and a dissolution of the Union, to a compliance with the requisitions of Congress, and the payment of its just debts; so that the officers and soldiers may expect considerable assistance, in recommencing their civil occupations, from the sums due to them from the public, which must and will most inevitably be paid.

In order to effect this desirable purpose, and to remove the prejudices, which may have taken possession of the minds of any of the good people of the States, it is earnestly recommended to all the troops, that, with strong attachments to the Union, they should carry with them into civil society the most conciliating dispositions, and that they should prove themselves not less virtuous and useful as citizens, than they have been persevering and victorious as soldiers. What though there should be some envious individuals, who are unwilling to pay the debt the public has contracted, or to yield the tribute due to merit; yet let such unworthy treatment produce no invective, or any instance of intemperate conduct. Let it be remembered, that the unbiased voice of the free citizens of the United States has promised the just reward and given the merited applause. Let it be known and remembered, that the reputation of the federal armies is established beyond the reach of malevolence; and let a consciousness of their achievements and fame still incite the men, who composed them, to honorable action; under the persuasion that the private virtues of economy, prudence, and industry, will not be less amiable in civil life, than the more splendid qualities of valor and perseverance were in the field. Every one may rest assured, that much, very much, of the future happiness of the officers and men, will depend upon the wise and manly conduct, which shall be adopted by them when they are mingled with the great body of the community. And, although the General has so frequently given it as his opinion in the most public and explicit manner, that, unless the principles of the Federal Government were properly supported, and the powers of the Union increased, the honor, dignity, and justice of the nation would be lost forever; yet he cannot help repeating, on this occasion, so interesting a sentiment, and leaving it as his last injunction to every officer and every soldier, who may view the subject in the same serious point of light, to add his best endeavors to those of his worthy fellow citizens toward effecting these great and valuable purposes, on which our very existence as a nation so materially depends.

The Commander-in-chief conceives little is now wanting, to enable the soldier, to change the military character into that of the citizen, but that steady and decent tenor of behavior, which has generally distinguished not only the army under his immediate command, but the different detachments and separate armies, through the course of war. From their good sense and prudence he anticipates the happiest consequences; and, while he congratulates them on the glorious occasion, which renders their services in the field no longer necessary, he wishes to express the serious obligations he feels himself under for the assistance he has received from every class and in every instance. He presents his thanks in the most serious and affectionate manner to general officers, as well for their counsel on many occasions, as for their ardor in promoting the success of the plans he had adopted; to the commandants of regiments and corps, and to the other officers, for their great zeal and attention in carrying his orders promptly into execution; to the staff, for their alacrity and exactness in performing the duties of their several departments; and to the non-commissioned officers and private soldiers, for their extraordinary patience and suffering, as well as their invincible fortitude in action. To the various branches of the army, the general takes this last and solemn opportunity of professing his inviolable attachment and friendship. He wishes more than mere professions were in his power; that he were really able to be useful to them in future life. He flatters himself, however, they will do him the justice to believe, that whatever could with propriety be attempted by him has been done.

And being now to conclude these his last public orders, to take his ultimate leave in a short time of the military character, and to bid a final adieu to the armies he has so long had the honor to command, he can only again offer in their behalf his recommendations to their grateful country, and his prayers to the God of armies. May ample justice be done them here, and may the choicest of Heaven's favors, both here and hereafter, attend those who, under the Divine auspices, have secured innumerable blessings for others. With these wishes and this benediction, the Commander-in-chief is about to retire from service. The curtain of separation will soon be drawn, and the military scene will be closed to him for ever.

TO BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

DEAR SIR: NEW YORK, 23 September, 1789.

The affectionate congratulations on the recovery of my health, and the warm expression of personal friendship, which were contained in your letter of the 16th instant, claim my gratitude. And the consideration, that it was written when you were afflicted with a painful malady, greatly increases my obligation for it.

Would to God, my dear Sir, that I could congratulate you upon the removal of that excruciating pain, under which you labor, and that your existence might close with as much ease to yourself, as its continuance has been beneficial to our country and useful to mankind; or, if the united wishes of a free people, joined with the earnest prayers of every friend to science and humanity, could relieve the body from pains or infirmities, you could claim an exemption on this score. But this cannot be, and you have within yourself the only recourse to which we can confidently apply for relief, a philosophic mind.

If to be venerated for benevolence, if to be admired for talents, if to be esteemed for patriotism, if to be beloved for philanthropy, can gratify the human mind, you must have the pleasing consolation to know, that you have not lived in vain. And I flatter myself that it will not be ranked among the least grateful occurrences of your life to be assured, that, so long as I retain my memory, you will be thought on with respect, veneration, and affection by your sincere friend.

TO JOHN ADAMS, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

DEAR SIR: MOUNT VERNON, 13 July, 1798.

I had the honor, on the evening of the 11th instant, to receive from the hands of the Secretary of War your favor of the 7th, announcing that you had, with the advise and consent of the Senate, appointed me Lieutenant-General and Commander-in-chief of all the armies raised or to be raised for the service of the United States.

I cannot express how greatly I am affected at this new proof of public confidence, and the highly flattering manner in which you have pleased to make the communication; at the same time I must not conceal from you my earnest wish, that the choice had fallen on a man less declined in years, and better qualified to encounter the usual vicissitudes of war.

You know, Sir, what calculations I had made relative to the probable course of events on my retiring from office, and the determination I had consoled myself with, of closing the remnant of my days in my present peaceful abode. You will, therefore, be at no loss to conceive and appreciate the sensations I must have experienced, to bring my mind to any conclusion that would pledge me, at so late a period of life, to leave scenes I sincerely love, to enter upon the boundless field of public action, incessant trouble, and high responsibility.

It was not possible for me to remain ignorant of, or indifferent to, recent transactions. The conduct of the Directory of France towards our Country, their insidious hostility to its government, their various practices to withdraw the affections of the People from it, the evident tendency of their arts and those of their agents to countenance and invigorate opposition, their disregard of solemn treaties and the laws of nations, their war upon our defenceless commerce, their treatment of our minister of peace, and their demands amounting to tribute, could not fail to excite in me corresponding sentiments with those my countrymen have so generally expressed in their affectionate addresses to you. Believe me, Sir, no one can more cordially approve of the wise and prudent measures of your administration. They ought to inspire universal confidence and will no doubt, combined with the state of things, call from Congress such laws and means, as will enable you to meet the full force and extent of the crisis.

Satisfied, therefore, that you have sincerely wished and endeavored to avert war, and exhausted to the last drop the cup of reconciliation, we can with pure hearts appeal to Heaven for the justice of our cause, and may confidently trust the final result to that kind Providence, who has heretofore and so often signally favored the people of these United States.

Thinking, in this manner, and feeling how incumbent it is upon every person of every description to contribute at all times to his country's welfare, and especially in a moment like the present, when everything we hold dear is so seriously threatened, I have finally determined to accept the Commission of Commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States; with the reserve only, that I shall not be called into the field until the army is in a situation to require my presence, or it becomes indispensable by the urgency of circumstances.

In making this reservation, I beg it to be understood, that I do not mean to withhold my assistance to arrange and organize the army, which you may think I can afford. I take the liberty also to mention, that I must decline having my acceptance considered as drawing after it any immediate charge upon the public, and that I cannot receive any emoluments annexed to the appointment, before entering into a situation to incur expense.

The Secretary of War being anxious to return to the seat of Government, I have detained him no longer than was necessary to a full communication upon the several points he had in charge. With very great respect and consideration, I have the honor to be, &c.

TO PATRICK HENRY

(Confidential)

DEAR SIR:

MOUNT VERNON, 15 January, 1799.

At the threshold of this letter I ought to make an apology for its contents; but, if you will give me credit for my motives, I will contend for no more, however erroneous my sentiments may appear to you.

It would be a waste of time to attempt to bring to the view of a person of your observation and discernment, the endeavors of a certain party among us to disquiet the public mind with unfounded alarms; to arraign every act of the administration; to set the people at variance with their government; and to embarrass all its measures. Equally useless would it be to predict what must be the inevitable consequences of such policy, if it cannot be arrested.

Unfortunately, and extremely do I regret it, the State of Virginia has taken the lead in this opposition. I have said the State, because the conduct of its legislature in the eyes of the world will authorize the expression, because it is an incontrovertible fact, that the principal leaders of the opposition dwell in it, and because no doubt is entertained I believe that, with the help of the chiefs in other States, all the plans are arranged and systematically pursued by their followers in other parts of the Union, though in no State except Kentucky, that I have heard of, has legislative countenance been obtained beyond Virginia.

It has been said that the great mass of the citizens of this State are well affected, notwithstanding, to the general government and the Union; and I am willing to believe it; but how is this to be reconciled with their suffrages at the election of representatives, both to Congress and their State legislature, who are men opposed to the first, and by the tendency of their measures would destroy the latter? Some among us have endeavored to account for this inconsistency, and, though convinced themselves of its truth, they are unable to convince others, who are unacquainted with the internal policy of the State.

One of the reasons assigned is, that the most respectable and best qualified characters amongst us will not come forward. Easy and happy in their circumstances at home, and believing themselves secure in their liberties and property, will not forsake their occupations, and engage in the turmoil of public business, or expose themselves to the calumnies of their opponents, whose weapons are detraction.

But, at such a crisis as this, when everything dear and valuable to us is assailed; when this party hangs upon the wheels of government as a dead weight, opposing every measure that is calculated for defense and self-preservation, abetting the nefarious views of another nation upon our rights, preferring, as long as they durst contend openly against the spirit and resentment of the people, the interest of France to the welfare of their own country, justifying the first at the expense of the latter; when every act of their own government is tortured, by constructions they will not bear, into attempts to trample and infringe upon the constitution with a view to introduce monarchy; when the most unceasing and the purest exertions, which were making to maintain a neutrality, proclaimed by the executive, approved unequivocally by Congress, by the State legislatures, nay, by the people themselves in various meetings, and to preserve the country in peace, are charged as a measure calculated to favor Great Britain at the expense of France, and all those, who had any agency in it are accused of being under the influence of the former and her pensioners; when measures are systematically and pertinaciously pursued, which must eventually dissolve the Union or produce coercion; I say, when these things are become so obvious, ought characters who are best able to rescue their country from the pending evil to remain at home? Rather ought they not to come forward, and by their talents and influence stand in the breach, which such conduct has made on the peace and happiness of this country, and oppose the widening of it?

Vain will it be to look for peace and happiness, or for the security of liberty or property, if civil discord should ensue. And what else can result from the policy of those amongst us, who by all the measures in their power, are driving matters to extremity, if they cannot be counteracted effectually? The views of men can only be known, or guessed at, by their words or actions. Can those of the leaders of opposition be mistaken, then, if judged by this rule? That they are followed by numbers, who are unacquainted with their designs, and suspect as little the tendency of their principles, I am fully persuaded. But, if their conduct is viewed with indifference, if there is activity and misrepresentation on one side, and supineness on the other, their numbers accumulated by intriguing and discontented foreigners under proscription, who were at war with their own governments, and the greater part of them with all governments, they will increase, and nothing short of Omniscience can foretell the consequences.

I come now, my good Sir, to the object of my letter, which is, to express a hope and an earnest wish, that you will come forward at the ensuing elections (if not for Congress which you may think would take you too long from home), as a candidate for representative in the General Assembly of this commonwealth.

There are, I have no doubt, very many sensible men, who oppose themselves to the torrent, that carries away others who had rather swim with than stem it without an able pilot to conduct them; but these are neither old in legislation, nor well known in the community. Your weight of character and influence in the House of Representatives would be a bulwark against such dangerous sentiments, as are delivered there at present. It would be a rallying point for the timid, and an attraction for the wavering. In a word, I conceive it of immense importance at this crisis, that you should be there; and I would fain hope, that all minor considerations will be made to yield to the measure.

If I have erroneously supposed that your sentiments on these subjects are in unison with mine, or if I have assumed a liberty, which the occasion does not warrant, I must conclude as I began, with praying that my motives may be received as an apology, and that my fear, that the tranquillity of the Union, and of the State in particular, is hastening to an awful crisis, has extorted them from me.

With great and very sincere regard and respect, I am, dear Sir, your most obedient, &c.

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS

From "The Farewell Address."

THERE is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the Administration of the Government, and serve to keep alive the Spirit of Liberty. This within certain limits is probably true—and in Government of a Monarchical cast, Patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose, and there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched; it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those entrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres; avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power, and proneness to abuse it, which predominates in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the Guardian of the Public Weal against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If in the opinion of the People, the distribution or modification of the Constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits, which lead to political prosperity, Religion and Morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of Patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great Pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of Men and Citizens. The mere Politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connexions with public and private felicity. Let it simply be asked where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths, which are the instruments of investigation in Courts of Justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition, that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure—reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

'Tis substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule indeed extends with more or less force to every species of Free Government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is, to use it as sparingly as possible: avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it—avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of Peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burthen which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your Representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should coöperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be Revenue—that to have Revenue there must be taxes—that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant—that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper objects (which is always a choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the Government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining Revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all Nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and Morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a People always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages, which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a Nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded; and that in place of them just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The Nation, which indulges towards another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each other more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable, when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed and bloody contests. The Nation prompted by ill-will and resentment sometimes impels to War the Government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The Government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times it makes the animosity of the Nation subservient to projects of hostility instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the Liberty, of Nations has been the victim.

So likewise a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betraying the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducement of justification: It leads also to concessions to the favorite Nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the Nation making the concessions; by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill-will, and a disposition to retaliate, in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite Nation) facility to betray, or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearance of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent Patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens, the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican Government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial; else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defence against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real Patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign Nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little Political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence therefore it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships, or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one People, under an efficient government, the period is not far off, when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected. When belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest guided by our justice shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humour, or caprice?

'Tis our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances, with any portion of the foreign world; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements (I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs, that honesty is the best policy). I repeat it therefore let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care to always keep ourselves, by suitable establishments, on a respectably defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand: neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with Powers so disposed—in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our Merchants, and to enable the Government to support them—conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit; but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied, as experience or circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that 'tis folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another, that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character—that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from Nation to Nation. 'Tis an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

SELECTED MAXIMS OF WASHINGTON

Liberty, when it begins to take root, is a plant of rapid growth.

THE FOUR PILLARS OF INDEPENDENCE

There are four things, which, I humbly conceive, are essential to the well-being, I may even venture to say, to the existence of the United States as an independent power :

First. An indissoluble union of the States under one Federal Head.

Second. A sacred regard to public justice.

Third. The adoption of a proper Peace Establishment.

Fourth. The prevalence of that pacific and friendly disposition among the people of the United States which will induce them to forget their local prejudices and politics; to make those mutual concessions which are requisite to the general prosperity; and, in some instances, to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community.

These are the pillars, on which the glorious fabric of our independency and national character must be supported.

Liberty is the basis. And whoever would dare to sap the foundation, or overturn the structure, under whatever specious pretext he may attempt it, will merit the bitterest execration, and the severest punishment which can be inflicted by his injured country.

Common danger brought the States into confederacy; and on their Union our safety and importance depend.

PUBLIC OPINION TO BE ENLIGHTENED

Promote, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge.

In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential, that public opinion should be enlightened.

In a free and republican government, you cannot restrain the voice of the multitude. Every man will speak as he thinks, or, more properly, without thinking, and consequently will judge of effects without attending to their causes.

Good measures should always be executed as soon as they are conceived and circumstances will admit.

NATIONAL REPUTATION

The virtue, moderation and patriotism, which marked the steps of the American people, in framing, adopting, and thus far carrying into effect our present system of government, have excited the admiration of nations.

It only now remains for us, to act up to those principles, which should characterize a free and enlightened people, that we may gain respect abroad, and insure happiness to ourselves and our posterity.

I hope, some day, we shall become a Storehouse and Granary for the World.

NON-INTERVENTION

I have always given it as my decided opinion, that no nation had a right to intermeddle in the internal concerns of another; that every one had a right to form and adopt whatever government they liked best to live under, themselves; and that if this country could, consistently with its engagements, maintain a strict neutrality, and thereby preserve peace, it was bound to do so by motives of policy, interest and every other consideration that ought to actuate a people situated as we are, already deeply in debt, and in a convalescent state from the struggles we have been engaged in ourselves.

Would to God the harmony of nations were an object that lay nearest to the hearts of sovereigns; and that the incentives to peace, of which commerce and facility of understanding each other are not the most inconsiderable, might be daily increased.

Peace with all the world is my sincere wish. I am sure it is our true policy, and am persuaded it is the ardent desire of the government.

THE JUDICIARY SYSTEM

I have always been persuaded, that the stability and success of the National Government, and consequently the happiness of the people of the United States, would depend, in a considerable degree, on the interpretation and execution of its laws.

THE LAKES

I am glad to hear, that the vessels for the Lakes are going on with such industry. Maintaining the superiority over the water, is certainly of infinite importance. I trust, neither courage nor activity will be wanting in those to whom this business is committed.

ESSENTIAL IMPORTANCE OF A STANDING ARMY

I most firmly believe the independence of the United States never will be established till there is an army on foot for war; and that, if we are to rely on occasional or annual levies, we must sink under the expense, and ruin must follow.

While the measures of government ought to be calculated to protect its citizens from all injury and violence, a due regard should be extended to those Indian tribes, whose happiness, in the course of events, so materially depends on the national justice and humanity of the United States.

NATIONAL IMPORTANCE OF A NAVAL FORCE

It is in our experience, that the most sincere neutrality is not a sufficient guard against the depredations of nations at war.

READINESS FOR WAR

The United States ought not to indulge a persuasion, that, contrary to the order of human events, they will for ever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms, with which the history of every nation abounds.

There is a rank due to the United States among nations, which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness.

If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it.

If we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known, that we are, at all times, ready for war.

INFLUENCE OF LEARNING

I am not a little flattered, by being considered, by the patrons of literature, as one of their number. Fully apprised of the influence which sound learning has on religion and manners, on government, liberty, and laws, I shall only lament my want of abilities to make it still more extensive.

DIFFIDENCE

Submit your sentiments with diffidence. A dictatorial style, though it may carry conviction, is always accompanied with disgust.

It is a maxim with me, that, in times of imminent danger to the country, every true patriot should occupy the post in which he can render his services most effectually.

ENDURANCE

We should never despair. Our situation has before been unpromising, and has changed for the better; so, I trust, it will again. If new difficulties arise, we must only put forth new exertions, and proportion our efforts to the exigency of the times.

THE PATRIOT'S HAPPINESS

To stand well in the good opinion of my countrymen, constitutes my chief happiness, and will be my best support under the perplexities and difficulties of my present situation.

CONNUBIAL LIFE

In my estimation, more permanent and genuine happiness is to be found in the sequestered walks of connubial life, than in the giddy rounds of promiscuous pleasure, or the more tumultuous and imposing scenes of successful ambition.

TALENTS WITHOUT VIRTUE

Without virtue, and without integrity, the finest talents and the most brilliant accomplishments can never gain the respect, and conciliate the esteem, of the truly valuable part of mankind.

CONSCIENCE

Labor to keep alive in your breast that little spark of celestial fire, called Conscience.

MORAL CHARACTER

A good moral character is the first essential in a man. It is therefore highly important to endeavor not only to be learned, but virtuous.

APPROBATION OF THE WISE AND GOOD

Nothing in human life can afford a liberal mind more rational and exquisite satisfaction than the approbation of a wise, a great, and a virtuous man.

TRIUMPH OF PRINCIPLE

In times of turbulence, when the passions are afloat, calm reason is swallowed up, in the extremes to which measures are attempted to be carried; but, when those subside, and its empire is resumed, the man who acts from principle, who pursues the path of truth, moderation and justice, will regain his influence.

THE BEST ANSWER TO CALUMNY

To persevere in one's duty and be silent is the best answer to calumny.

IDLE FORMS

Every one who has any knowledge of my manner of acting in public life, will be persuaded that I am not accustomed to impede the despatch, or frustrate the success of business, by a ceremonious attention to idle forms.

Religion is as necessary to reason as reason is to religion. The one cannot exist without the other. A reasoning being would lose his reason, in attempting to account for the great phenomena of nature, had he not a Supreme Being to refer to; and well has it been said, that if there had been no God, mankind would have been obliged to imagine one.

NATIONAL RIGHTEOUSNESS AND THE DIVINE FAVOR

The propitious smiles of Heaven can never be expected, on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right, which Heaven itself has ordained.

THE PURE AND BENIGN LIGHT OF REVELATION

The free cultivation of letters, the unbounded extension of commerce, the progressive refinement of manners, the growing liberality of sentiment, and above all, the pure and benign light of Revelation, have had an ameliorating influence on mankind, and increased the blessings of society.

SPIRIT OF CHRISTIANITY

It would ill become me to conceal the joy that I have felt in perceiving the fraternal affection which appears to increase every day among the friends of genuine religion. It affords edifying prospects, indeed, to see Christians, of every denomination, dwell together in more charity, and conduct themselves, in respect to each other, with a more Christian-like spirit, than ever they have done in any former age, or in any other nation.

RELIGIOUS TENETS AND CIVIL LIFE

We have abundant reason to rejoice, that, in this land, the light of truth and reason have triumphed over the power of bigotry and superstition, and that every person may here worship God according to the dictates of his own heart.

In this enlightened age, and in this land of equal liberty, it is our boast, that a man's religious tenets will not forfeit the protection of the laws, nor deprive him of the right of attaining and holding the highest offices that are known in the United States.

THOMAS E. WATSON

[1856—]

LUCIAN LAMAR KNIGHT

MEN of strong and positive convictions seldom fail to develop sharp antagonisms. Especially is this true of one who, with consummate eloquence, has been the advocate of a 'cause; and the subject of this sketch has been no exception to that rule. Twice he has been the candidate of the People's Party for the high office of President of the United States. Besides, he has borne the brunt of many arduous campaigns in the interest of governmental reform; and if, in this biographical and critical portraiture of Watson the author, it becomes necessary to speak of Watson the political leader, it is because the two are so intimately interwoven that the one is needed to supplement and to interpret the other.

Even the most casual survey of Mr. Watson's life-work will suffice to show that both in letters and in politics he has been essentially the same man—impelled by the same high motives—dominated by the same fixed principles. In other words, whether the instrument for the time being has been the tongue or the pen, he has been the consistent champion of popular rights. From the moment of his first mental awakening he has been an assiduous student of the democratic trend of government. This may be due in part to his philosophic cast of mind. But the circumstances of his early environment, his youthful struggles with poverty, his intimate experience with the seamy side of life, his familiar acquaintance with hard work on the plantation, when his frail health and slender figure made the burdens doubly onerous—these more fully explain the secret of his life-long allegiance to the masses. Through all his writings runs the unifying thread of one supreme incentive: the desire to uplift the common people. This will be fully seen when we come to discuss his literary product more in detail.

It is by no means a corollary to what has been said that Mr. Watson was himself of humble or obscure origin. He was not. On both sides of the house, his ancestors were of good Quaker stock. They moved into Georgia in 1750 from North Carolina, coming with the band of settlers who purchased some of the alluvial acres between the Savannah and Ogeechee rivers, and built the town of Wrightsville. They were land-owners and slave-holders. To quote in substance the language of Mr. Watson, his family was active in political and military affairs from the beginning of the settlement until the Civil War ended the old régime in the South, and was identified in every respect with the local gentry of the middle class.

Thomas E. Watson was born at the old home place near Thomson, in McDuffie County, September 5, 1856. Not far distant were the homes of two of his favorite heroes, Toombs and Stephens. From the common schools of the neighborhood he went to the high school at Thomson; and it was while attending the latter institution that his literary genius began to exhibit tokens of the coming author. He was always ready with his pen; and when other students were declaiming selections from 'The Boys' Speaker,' this precocious youngster in knee-trousers was writing his own orations. Though destined in after years to sway great multitudes, and to move the eminence of men's affections with the divine power of eloquence, the declaimer's medal was a trophy which constantly eluded his ambitious efforts; but it was ever a source of pride and satisfaction that he needed the assistance of no one in his debates and compositions.

Upon the advice of the principal of the village academy, young Watson was sent to college; and, the family being strongly Baptist in matters ecclesiastical, the college chosen was Mercer. Due to financial embarrassments at home, however, he remained at college only two years, relinquishing his studies in bitter disappointment at the end of the sophomore year to aid in the support of his father's household. The old home place having been sacrificed, what remained to them of domestic goods and chattels were transferred from Thomson to Augusta. Finding little else to do, he taught school for a while in Screven County; but he was too full of the fire of the advocate to be satisfied with the rôle of pedagogue. At leisure intervals, during the long winter evenings by the light of pine fagots, he began the study of Blackstone, the volume over which he pored being the gift of an old friend.

The first public speech Mr. Watson ever delivered was made at this time. It was on the subject of temperance; and some years later, when serving in the State Legislature, this beardless enemy of bar-rooms closed the debate upon the bill which eventually put four-fifths of the counties of the State under local option.

On giving up the school, he went back to Thomson to begin the practice of law, having previously been admitted to the Bar when only nineteen. Fortunate enough to obtain credit for a year's board, he displayed his professional shingle, and, while waiting for clients, he assisted the clerk in recording court papers. The first year his practice brought him only $212, which barely enabled him to liquidate his debt. The second year he earned $474; and he also undertook the repurchase of the old home place, buying a few acres at a time. He brought the family back from Augusta and, taking up his abode in the household, he thought nothing of the brisk three-mile walk which stretched between the town and the farm. Clients slowly but steadily increased in number, and fees grew by substantial multiples until his yearly income aggregated $12,000. In the meantime he won the happiest of all his suits by leading to the altar Miss Georgia Durham, who became his ideal helpmeet and companion. This was in 1878. She brought him no dowry of dollars, but she has been an ever-present inspiration at his fireside and in his life.

It was in 1882 that Mr. Watson was sent to the State Legislature. The year following he was a delegate to the gubernatorial convention. He opposed the renomination of Governor Colquitt and, in an impromptu speech which was less than ten minutes long, the clarion voice and the boylike figure of the young orator fairly stormed the assemblage. It recalled the dramatic début of Mr. Stephens in 1836 and announced the arrival of another tribune.

But we cannot linger even upon the dramatic episodes of Mr. Watson's eventful career. Only the most cursory review can be taken. In 1888 he was elector from the State-at-large on the Democratic ticket and stumped the State for Cleveland on the platform of tariff revision. The prestige derived from this campaign resulted in his subsequent election to Congress, the returns from the ballot-box giving him every county in the district except his competitor's, in which he made no contest.

It was at this time that the Farmers' Alliance began to emerge. Mr. Watson was not a member of this organization. But he felt that his election was due in large measure to the agricultural interests of his district; and when the farmers in national conclave urged every Congressman who was in sympathy with them to stand by the principles of the order, regardless of party affiliations, he felt bound in honor to respect this appeal. It came from the ranks of the toiling masses. He knew only too well the burdens under which they struggled. It was a period of great financial stress, for the cotton crop, which clothed the world, was bringing them only the merest pittance. To make buckle and tongue meet and to keep the wolf from the door was the difficult problem of many humble homes. The farmers made up the rank and file of the Democratic party in his district; and to the cause of the oppressed yeomanry he devoted both his time and his talent. On returning home, at the close of the session, he was met at the station by an enthusiastic host that for two hours cheered to the echo his arraignment of the Democratic party, which he charged with having forsaken the doctrines of Jefferson.

For taking this bold stand he was, of course, assailed by all who adhered to the Democratic organization; and, the district having been "gerrymandered" in advance of the approaching election, he was not returned to Congress. But he carried every one of the old counties that still remained in the district, except Richmond, in which he claimed that ballot-box frauds had been committed.

This ended the Congressional service of Mr. Watson, but during his tenure of office he built an enduring memorial to his statesmanship in placing upon the statute-books the law that provides for the present free-delivery system in the rural districts, besides stamping his impress upon other important enactments.

The panic of 1893 was the culminating disaster in the catalogue of evils that aroused the "embattled farmers." To Mr. Watson it was like the imperious call of another Lexington. It summoned him once more to the front; and from this time he devoted himself heart and soul to the movement which at this crisis began to assume the colossal proportions of the People's Party. Mr. Cleveland was in the Presidential chair. By reason of his monetary views, the Democracy was divided and the country was demoralized. In this condition of affairs the new movement gathered strength. Refusing large fees and declining lecture engagements, Mr. Watson began an educational campaign at his own expense in the interest of Jeffersonian principles; and among other things he undertook to edit the People's Party paper in Atlanta. If he abandoned the flag of Democracy—to quote in substance his own words—it was because the old party had drifted from the ancient moorings; and, under the banner of Populism, he claimed to be fighting for the same eternal principles. In the opinion of Mr. Watson, both Republicans and Democrats were the political allies of Wall Street, and upon the hustings he scored them with equal warmth. Some of the best speeches of his life were made during the progress of this campaign. The vicissitudes of early experience were bearing fruit in magnificent pleas for the common people; and Mr. Watson became the acknowledged leader of the great uprising which received the name of Populism.

In time the new political organization embraced two million voters, and this was the party strength when the campaign of 1896 arrived. The Democracy was still divided. But the majority faction advocated radical reform, and between the Democratic and the Populist parties an alliance was formed that year, the former, like the latter, advocating a return to bimetalism for the relief of the financial stringency. Under the terms of this agreement, the Democratic ticket was Bryan and Sewall and the Populist ticket Bryan and

Watson. To this combination of banners, which was an excellent strategic coup for the divided Democracy, Mr. Watson yielded reluctant consent; but subsequent events showed that he misconceived the spirit in which the proposed plan of fusion was made, and that nothing short of the complete absorption of the Populist Party was intended. This disclosure prevented the coöperation which was necessary to success, and defeat ensued with such results that the Democratic party was utterly demoralized, while the Populist party was almost entirely disbanded. In fact, no concerted effort to retrieve the disaster was made by the latter party for eight years.

It was in the wake of this eventful campaign of 1896 that Thomas E. Watson turned from the disappointments of politics to the consolations of literature; and, while it was the iron hand of Fate that thrust him into the gentle realm of letters, he found himself in this new land of enchantment face to face with the crowning achievements of his life. Through the medium of his trenchant and facile pen, he began to put into the most fascinating of literary forms the mature fruit of his philosophical investigations. It was a labor of love; his inspiration and his theme were still the common people; and book after book leaped from the unwearied brain of the tireless tribune.

First came 'The Story of France.' This work grew out of some occasional sketches written for his paper several years previously, wherein he undertook to show how the greed of the few, working in the interest of class legislation, wrecked the French monarchy and precipitated the French Revolution. Next followed 'Napoleon.' To Mr. Watson the "Man of Destiny" has ever been the most fascinating figure in history, fighting his way from the obscure rôle of the charity student to the imperial throne of France, evolving the Code Napoleon which remains to-day the enduring memorial of his statesmanship, and making all Europe tremble at the bare mention of his name. The author uses this great military genius to show what can be accomplished under modern conditions by giving intelligent direction to the democratic impulse, and so long as Napoleon was content to represent the aspirations of the awakened French populace, to quote the words of Mr. Watson, he was irresistible. "It was only when he united the church and the state and divorced Josephine to wed the stupid daughter of an imbecile Austrian emperor," he adds, "that Napoleon's power began to wane." In the effort to found a dynasty leagued with European monarchies and aristocracies, he lost the support of the people, without gaining the support of the titled classes, and the result was Waterloo. Jefferson and Jackson both exemplify the principles upon which a government of the people must be founded, in opposition to the class rule, which is represented by the school of Alexander Hamilton. 'Waterloo' is a monograph of the great battle that terminated the career of Napoleon. 'Bethany' is a story of the old South, cast in the mold of romance, but descriptive of historical scenes and incidents. Mr. Watson has also published his 'Life and Speeches,' 'Prose Miscellanies,' 'Sketches from Roman History' and a 'Hand-Book of Politics and Economics.' With respect to the author's style, it may be said that, without the least suggestion of pedantry, it is both graphic and vigorous, resembling the mountain brook, not only in its rapid flow, but in its transparent crystal.

The nomination of Alton B. Parker by the Democratic Convention of 1904 signalized the swing of the Democratic pendulum from the reforms advocated by Populism to the policies that the new party opposed. In other words, to use the language of Mr. Watson, it yielded to the seductive influence of the monetary power; and, this change of attitude serving to resuscitate the cause of Populism, Mr. Watson, in the interest of Jeffersonian principles, was unanimously nominated for the office of President of the United States. This honor was again conferred upon him in 1908. Though in each instance the fight was unsuccessful, he fought like an old warrior whose heart was wedded to his banner; and, whatever may have been the failures of Populism, it has undoubtedly produced wholesome agitation, and to this extent at least it has been instrumental in accomplishing many salutary reforms.

In 1904 Mr. Watson began the publication in New York of Tom Watson's Magazine, but the alliance he formed with other parties proved unfortunate, and he withdrew from this enterprise to launch in Atlanta the Weekly Jeffersonian and the Jeffersonian Magazine, both of which ventures have been successful.

Still in the vigorous prime of life, Mr. Watson has relinquished political ambitions for literary activities, and continues to write with a pen that has lost neither the brilliant sparkle nor the keen edge of the polished diamond. He is absolutely fearless in discussing men and measures. He believes in hewing to the line, regardless of where the chips may fall. But he is still the fast friend of the common people and, when he can no longer write a word or frame a whisper, his devotion to the old cause will claim his last pulse-beats. Despite the slanderous darts of which he has too often been the victim, amid the asperities of partisan politics, he is absolutely above the wiles of the tempter; and, to quote the words of Alfred Henry Lewis, "a syndicate could no more buy Watson and own Watson than it could buy and own a continent." It is probably true that Mr. Watson has really taken his leave of public life. For he is enamored of his literary labors and is accomplishing what many believe to be his best work in the wider forum of letters. Fighter though he is, he is not at heart combative. The tenderest solicitude for the oppressed has ever guided the ponderous swing of his battle-ax; and all who have known him in his home life declare with one voice of testimony that neither his happiest moments nor his greatest triumphs have been found in the arena of debate but in the fireside realm of domestic affections.

PATRIOTISM OF THE REVOLUTIONISTS

From 'The Story of France.' Copyright, The Macmillan Company, and used here by permission of the author and the publishers.

It is the insanity of malice to attribute unworthy motives to men of this type [Lafayette, Condorcet, Louvet, and other men of the Revolution]. They care nothing for office, power, or riches. They care for principle. They worship ideals. They live and die for creeds. The world rarely understands, never fully appreciates, nearly always breaks them upon the wheel of stern misconception, rabid persecution, or cruel neglect. Such men bend beneath the curse of Cassandra. They tell unwelcome truths, are not believed, and perish with those who scoffed at their warnings. The multitude understands the baser men more readily—just as the baser men understand the multitude. The baser men combine against the higher types, and almost invariably crush them. It is the reformer's misfortune, usually, to be ahead of his times. He preaches what to his generation seems to be utopianism. To the next generation, it is accepted truth. But the reformer, by that time, is dead. He died of a broken heart, because the people would not comprehend him and rudely shoved him aside.

The coldly practical men scorn these enthusiasts. Yet the doctrinaire, the dreamer, eventually rules the world. The tawdry glory of the Bourbons, girded round about by triple defences of soldiers and nobles and priests, fell like a mid-summer's night dream before the books of Voltaire and Rousseau—fugitives both and despised doctrinaires. . . .

And so they passed away, the men who would have regenerated the world. They could not agree among themselves, they devoured each other, leaving the world unregenerated; but before they fell they had done a work which all the forces of reaction could not destroy. They had given France an internal organization which Napoleon was satisfied to perfect, but was too wise to abolish. They had given her a uniform system of weights and measures, and had almost completed a uniform code of laws. They had given her a system of education which, commencing at the primary school, rose grade by grade to the Normal and the Polytechnic, the School of Medicine, and to the Institute, the Lyceum Course, the Conservatory of Art and Trades, and of Music. They had inaugurated a state socialism which recognized the principle that society owes something to the citizen in return for what it exacts of him, and that any state is disgraced where its workmen, seeking work, can find none; and where its poor die of want at the doors of the rich. They had found the finances hopelessly disordered, the nation bankrupt. If they left this condition as bad as they found it, there was yet this to be said: they had given the people a currency which had not only kept the nation alive, but which had opened thousands of new fields to tillage, which had banished famine and hushed the cry of hunger; which had fed and equipped fourteen armies, and had made good the splendid audacity with which Republican France had challenged Monarchical Europe. They had given France an army which had met successfully a world in arms. Belgium had been annexed, Holland made a tributary, England and Austria fought to a standstill; Prussia compelled to sue for peace after repeated defeats, and Spain brought to her knees.

The mass of the French people was dead, the Revolutionists breathed into it the breath of life. It was blind, and they gave it sight; dumb, and they taught it to speak. They found the fairest lands given over to rabbits and deer; they opened them to men and women. They found a government of 270,000 over 25,000,000; they established a rule of all over all—each a ruler and each a subject. If the Church complained of lands taken, altars broken, and priests put to death, they could say: "You had gone astray, forsaken your duty, betrayed the Master. Your wealth had made you proud, your pride had made you oppressive. Your priests were slain because they put themselves above the law; your images were broken because we hated a religion which had become all form and ceremony—tender with marble virgins and saints, but hard as flint with human sons, daughters, fathers, mothers. We have not been a curse to you, but a blessing in disguise. Through us, God chastens you. We have taught you humility, having made you poor. We have purified you by persecution. We have driven you through the valley of the shadow of death, but the path of sorrow will lead you out to the light. You will henceforth see your own sins. You will regenerate yourself—will be born again. And when the day comes that you again deserve the respect of good men and good women, you will get it. You will again be honoured and obeyed—not for your forms, your ceremonies, your pretended miracles, and your appeals to fear and to superstition, but because you represent man's longing for higher and better life, his innate conviction that it is better to be good than bad, better to believe in a hereafter of happiness for the saved, than in the endless sleep whose bed is in the grave, and whose eternity is dust."

These men of the Revolution had set the frozen currents in motion in every sphere of life; they had slain privilege, and loosed the limbs of competition; they had overthrown hereditary monopoly of wealth and honour, power and culture, and had opened wide the doors to all who would come. They had abolished the fetich worship which had prostrated a nation at the feet of a king. They had given the people a new ideal—self-respect, love of country, love of heroic achievement, love of good laws, love of self-government, equality, and liberty. They had broken the slumber of a thousand years, and called Frenchmen to nobler activities, higher aims, worthier lives. They found France reduced from her high place among the nations, her power despised, her flag insulted on land and sea! They put success in the place of failure, victory in lieu of defeat. They could have said with truth: "We have pushed your frontiers further than they were under Louis XIV. when he was at his best. For Rossbach we have given you Valmy and Jemmapes; for Blenheim, Hondschote and Fleurus; for your colonial empire lost by the Bourbons, we bring you Belgium, Avignon, Piedmont, and Holland. We found your armies dwindling away under such imbeciles as Lauzun, Dillon, Luckner, Rochambeau, and Broglie; we leave them in the hands of the greatest number of great generals that any nation on earth ever had before or will probably ever have again."

Every word of this would have been sober fact. They had done it—the results spoke for themselves. And even then all had not been said. They might have added: "We have taught the people the secret of their power—the secret also of the weakness of priests, aristocracy, and king. We have taught the masses to read, to think, to act, for themselves. We have forever destroyed the idea that God made a nation to obey the selfish whims of one man, minister to his wants, and feed the prurient appetites of his court. We have shown the people how to rebel, how to organize, how to fight tyranny, how to govern when thrones fall. We were not wreckers, only. We were builders, also. We meant to create the State anew. We meant to evolve a higher civilization. We loved France—loved our fellow-man, and our failure hurt us most because it shattered our ideal. We were not in the work for gain, for personal advancement. Power we loved, but it was power to work out our plans. We have failed. We worked too fast. The world was not ready for us. But we have sown the seed; the harvest will yet ripen. The world will never be the same that it was before we came. We leave our mark upon it; and where our work ends, others will take it up and carry it on. The prophet dies, but the Word lives: the leader falls, but the flag moves on, borne by other hands. We die, we pass out into the night; but we shall come again. In our principles we shall yet live, in our legislation we shall yet be honoured; in our creed we shall yet rule the world."

Time has avenged these pioneers of modern civilization. They were slain because they came too early; and the men who slew them, having had time for reflection, adopted, one after another, the principles for which the pioneers had died. German armies marched to shoot down the French Revolution; the Bourbon throne was once more set up, and a Bourbon king put upon it; and Germany then went to reforming her laws after the example set by the French Revolution. England poured out her treasure and her blood to check the spread of French principles; and she seemed to have succeeded. Yet England, after a while, grew ashamed of her code, changed her labor laws, her school laws, her poor laws, drifting to State socialism, to the Gladstone Land Act which lends money to tenants to buy farms, and to the Chamberlain programme which pensions worn-out workmen and aids labourers to purchase homes. "Society owes a sacred duty to those who have served it, those who do serve it, and those who may serve it"—thus spoke the Jacobin to a world which was not ready to hear him. It killed him first, and heard him afterwards. Imperial England, having suppressed the Indian Mutiny with a wholesale barbarity which would have made Danton shudder, and sent Robespierre to one of his days of seclusion in the Duplay attic, copies Danton, follows Robespierre, and cautiously, but steadily, advances along the road they blazed a hundred years ago.

And so the world moves on in God's mysterious way. The sound of the rifle which shoots down the reformer may advertise the reform and carry it far beyond the limits it otherwise would have passed. The potter turns his wheel, the weaver's shuttle flies back and forth, the statesman moulds his laws—and what the finished product in any case may be, the workman himself cannot know.

Cambon, the honest republican, helped to kill Robespierre, and dragged the lengthening chain of regret all the days of his after life. Billaud, the stern democrat, helped to kill Robespierre, and bitterly rued it as he crouched for home and protection among the blacks the Jacobins had freed. "I am the Resurrection and the Life!"—the pæan of Truth for all times, among all peoples; and wherever the valiant soldiers of progress wage battle for humanity's sake, there the better spirit of the Jacobin strives; there the heroic Frenchmen who are dead live again, bracing the courage and guiding the feet of the armies of Right, as they go marching into the dawn.

JOAN OF ARC

. . . THEREFORE solemn judgment is rendered in Joan's favor. She is unanimously acquitted of the charges made against her. The verdict of guilty is quashed and Joan is declared "rehabilitated."

Joan's family feel gratified.

The people feel gratified.

The Church feels gratified.

The king, especially, feels gratified.

Joan, only, feels nothing. Joan is dead.

Twenty-five years have passed away since the fires at Rouen burned out and died; since the ashes of the brave and tender girl were cast into the Seine and were carried forth to sublime burial in the sad and solemn sea, where only the mourning waves could chant her dirge, the silent stars light her funeral and the great God mark her grave. . . .

Joan of Arc is one of the Mystics—one of those strangely endowed and inspired people, who, with the slenderest human support, alter the course of the world's history.

Like Mohammed, Peter the Hermit, and Ignatius Loyola, there seemed to be nothing supernatural about her, save her intense concentration of purpose and the vivid imagination which made her fancies appear realities.

The world cannot comprehend such characters, nor resist them, nor forget them.

Joan lives as truly to-day as when she laid flowers upon the altars, or when she led the wavering lines of battle back to victory.

Possessing no relic of her, no painting, no full description, the minds of after generations have tried earnestly to realize the face and the form of this "country girl who overthrew the power of England."

Poets have sung of her in immortal verse; painters have dreamed of her on imperishable canvas; sculptors, in the purity and strength of marble, have made her appear in the lovely shape she took in their own ideals.

Splendid monuments commemorate her at Orleans and at Paris. Every year at Orleans a festival is held in her honour, as it has been, with few intervals, ever since her death.

The French have loved many kings, warriors, statesmen, poets, and philosophers; but it may be safely said that in those sacred national archives, where veneration and love and profound respect guard the priceless heritage of great names and glorious examples, no king, no chieftain, no statesman, poet or philosopher disputes the place held by the shepherd girl, who was to France what the shepherd boy was to Israel.

THE FALL OF PARIS

From 'Napoleon.' Copyright, The Macmillan Company, and used here by permission of the author and the publishers.

IN the movements which followed, the Bonaparte of the Italian campaign was seen again, and for the last time. He was everywhere, he was tireless, he was inspiring, he was faultless, he was a terror to his foes. We see him heading charges with reckless dash, see him aiming cannon in the batteries, see him showing his recruits how to build bridges, see him check a panic by spurring his own horse up to a live shell and holding him there till the bomb exploded, see him rallying fugitives, on foot, and sword in hand. We hear him appeal to his tardy marshals to "Pull on the boots and the resolution of 1793"; we hear him address the people and the troops with the military eloquence of his best days; we see him writing all night after marching or fighting all day—his care and his efforts embracing everything, and achieving all that was possible to man.

That was a pretty picture at the crossing of the river Aube, where Napoleon was making a hasty bridge out of ladders spliced together, floored with blinds taken from the houses near by. Balls were tearing up the ground where the Emperor stood; but yet when he was about to quench his extreme thirst by dipping up in his hands the water of the river, a little girl of the village, seeing his need, ran to him with a glass of wine. Empire was slipping away from him, and his mind must have been weighed down by a thousand cares; but he was so touched by the gallantry of the little maid that he smiled down upon her, as he gratefully drank, and he said:—

“Mademoiselle, you would make a brave soldier!”

Then he added playfully, “Will you take the epaulets? Will you be my aide-de-camp?” He gave her his hand, which she kissed, and as she turned to go he added, “Come to Paris when the war is over, and remind me of what you did to-day; you will feel my gratitude.”

He was no gentleman; he had not a spark of generosity in his nature; he was mean and cruel; he was a superlatively bad man. So his enemies say, beginning at Lewis Goldsmith and ending at Viscount Wolseley. It may be so; but it is a little hard on the average citizen who would like to love the good men and hate the bad ones that a “superlatively evil man” like Napoleon Bonaparte should be endowed by Providence with qualities which make such men as Wellington, Metternich, Talleyrand, Czar Alexander, Emperor Francis, or Bourbon Louis seem small, seem paltry, seem prosaic and sordid beside him. . . .

Napoleon, with twenty-five thousand, hurried to the support of his marshals, and was in Blücher’s rear by March 1. Once more the Prussian seemed doomed. His only line of retreat lay through Soissons and across the Aisne. With Napoleon hot upon his track, and in his rear a French fortress, how was he to escape destruction? A French weakling, or traitor, had opened the way by surrendering Soissons. Had he but held the town for a day longer, the war might have ended by a brilliant triumph of the French. Moreau was the name of the commandant at Soissons—a name of ill-omen to Napoleon, whose fury was extreme.

“Have that wretch arrested,” he wrote, “and also the members of the council of defence; have them arraigned before a military commission composed of general officers, and, in God’s name, see that they are shot in twenty-four hours.”

Here was lost the most splendid opportunity which came to the French during the campaign. Blücher safely crossed the Aisne (March 3) in the night, and was attacked by Marmont on March 9. During the day the French were successful; but Blücher launched at the unwary Marmont a night attack which was completely successful. The French lost forty-five guns and twenty-five hundred prisoners. In a sort of desperation, Napoleon gave battle at Laon, but was so heavily outnumbered that he was forced to retreat.

Almost immediately, however, he fell upon the Russians at Rheims, March 13, killed their general, St. Priest, and destroyed their force. It was at this time that Langeron, one of Blücher's high officers, wrote: "We expect to see this terrible man everywhere. He has beaten us all, one after another; we dread the audacity of his enterprises, the swiftness of his movements, and the ability of his combinations. One has scarcely conceived any scheme of operations before he has destroyed it."

This tribute from an enemy is very significant of what "this terrible man" might have accomplished had he been seconded. Suppose Murat and Eugène had been operating on the allied line of communications! Or suppose Augereau had done his duty in Switzerland, in the rear of the Allies! Spite of the odds, it seems certain that Napoleon would have beaten the entire array had he not been shamefully betrayed—abandoned by creatures of his own making. . . .

Did ever a tragedy show darker lines than this? All Europe marching against one man, his people divided, his lieutenants mutinous and inclining to treason, his senators ready to depose him, a sister and a brother-in-law stabbing him to the vitals, members of his Council of Regency in communication with the enemy, nobles whom he had restored and enriched plotting his destruction, and his favorite brother, his Lieutenant-General of the Kingdom, using the opportunity which the trust afforded to debauch his wife!

Is it any wonder that even this indomitable spirit sometimes bent under the strain? . . .

After the Emperor's repulse at Laon, Schwarzenberg took heart and advanced toward Paris; but Napoleon, leaving Rheims, marched to Eprenay, and the Austrians fell back, pursued by the French. The allied armies, however, concentrated at Arcis on the Aube, and, with one thousand men, beat off the Emperor when he attacked them with thirty thousand.

Napoleon now made his fatal mistake—fatal because he could count on no one but himself. He moved his army to the rear of the Allies to cut their line of communications. This was a move ruinous to them, if the French armies in front should do their duty. The despatches in which Napoleon explained his march to the Empress Regent at Paris fell into the hands of the enemy, owing to Marmont's disobedience of orders in abandoning the line of communications. They hesitated painfully, they had even turned and made a day's march following Napoleon, when the capture of a bundle of letters from Paris, and the receipt of invitations from traitors and royalists in Paris, revealed the true situation there, and convinced them that by a swift advance they could capture the city and end the war. Accordingly they turned about, detaching a trifling force to harass and deceive the Emperor.

These movements, Napoleon to the rear and the Allies toward Paris, decided the campaign. The small force of eight or ten thousand, which the Allies had sent to follow the Emperor, was cut to pieces by him at St. Dizier and from the prisoners taken in the action he learned of rumors that the Allies were in full march upon Paris. He soon learned, also, that through Marmont's disobedience of orders a severe defeat had been inflicted upon the two marshals, and that Blücher and Schwarzenberg had united.

What shall Napoleon now do? Should he continue his march, gather up the garrisons of his fortresses, enroll recruits, and, having cut the enemy's communications, return to give him battle? He wished to do so, urged it upon the council of war, and at St. Helena repeated his belief that this course would have saved him. It might have done so. The army of the Allies, when it reached Paris, only numbered about one hundred and twenty thousand. Half that number of troops were almost within the Emperor's reach, and there were indications that the peasantry, infuriated by the brutality of the invaders, were about to rise in mass. At this time they could have been armed, for Napoleon had captured muskets by the thousand from the enemy. If Marmont and Mortier would but exhaust the policy of obstruction and resistance; if Joseph and War-minister Clarke, at Paris, would but do their duty, the Allies would be caught between two fires, for the Emperor would not be long in marshalling his strength and coming back.

But the older and higher officers were opposed to the plan. They told Napoleon that he must march at once to the relief of Paris. After a night of meditation and misery at St. Dizier, he set out on the return (March 28, 1814). At Doulevent he received cipher despatches from Lavalette, postmaster-general in Paris, warning him that if he would save the capital he had not a moment to lose. This message aroused him for the first time to the extremity of the peril. He had expected a stubborn resistance from Marmont, had relied upon greater effectiveness in Joseph and Clarke. But even now he did not realize the awful truth, the absolute necessity for his immediate presence to save Paris—else he would have mounted horse and spurred across France as he had once done, to smaller purpose, across Spain: as he had done the year before when Dresden was beleaguered. In this connection let us remember what he had told Meneval—that he was no longer able to endure horse exercise. For a cause which may have been physical, he did not mount a horse himself, for the long life-and-death ride, but he sent General Dejean. Through this messenger he told Joseph that he was coming at full speed, and would reach Paris in two days. Let the Allies be resisted for only two days—he would answer for the balance. Away sped Dejean, and he reached the goal in time.

The Empress and the King of Rome had been sent from the capital by Joseph, and Joseph had taken horse to follow; but Dejean spurred after him, and caught him up in the Bois de Boulogne. Brother's message was delivered to brother, Napoleon's appeal made to Joseph; and the answer, coldly given and stubbornly repeated, was, "Too late."

The Allies had marched, dreading every hour to hear the returning Emperor come thundering on their rear; Marmont had made one of the worst managed of retreats, and had allowed the enemy to advance far more rapidly than they had dared to hope; Parisians had vainly clamored for arms, that they might defend their city; and while thousands of citizens stood on the heights of Montmartre, looking expectantly for the Emperor, who was known to be coming, and while the cry, "It is he! It is he!" occasionally broke out as some figure on a white horse was seen in the distance, the imbecile Joseph wrote to the traitorous Marmont the permission to capitulate.

This note had not been delivered, the fight was still going on, and Dejean prayed Joseph to recall the note. "The Emperor will be here to-morrow! For God's sake, give him one day!"

With a sullen refusal to wait, Joseph put spurs to his horse, and set out to rejoin Maria Louisa.

In the dark corridors of human passion and prejudice, who can read the truth? The rebukes of the outraged husband to a recreant brother may have swayed Joseph, just as the reproofs of an indignant chief to a disobedient subordinate may have controlled Marmont.

The note from Joseph did its work. The defence ceased, the French army marched out, and the chief city of France fell, almost undefended.

Talleyrand and his clique had invited the Allies to march upon the capital, and the same party of traitors had paralyzed the spirit of the defence as far as they were able. They had found unconscious but powerful accomplices in Napoleon's brothers.

That night the French troops marching away from Paris, according to the terms of the capitulation, were met, only a few miles from the city, by Napoleon. After having sent Dejean, he had hurried his troops on to Doulaincourt, where more bad news was picked up; and, by double marches, he reached Troyes (March 29), where he rested. At daybreak he left his army to continue its march, while he, with a small escort, flew on to Villeneuve. There he threw himself into a coach and, followed by a handful of officers, dashed forward—to Sens, where he learned that the Allies were before Paris—to Fontainebleau, where he was told of the flight of the Empress—to Essonnes, where they said that the fight of Paris was raging—and to La Cour de France, only ten miles from his capital, where at midnight (March 30), as he waited for a fresh team to be put to his carriage, he heard the tramp of horses and the clank of arms. It was a squadron of cavalry on the highroad from Paris. He shouted to them from the dark, and to his challenge came the terrible response, "Paris has fallen."

The scene which followed is one of those which haunt the memory. The chilly gloom of the night, the little wayside inn, the halted cavalry, the horseless carriage, the rage of the maddened Emperor, his hoarse call for fresh horses, his furious denunciation of those who had betrayed him, his desperate efforts to hurry the post-boys at the stables, the passion which carried him forward on foot a mile along the road to Paris, and the remonstrances of his few friends who urged him to go back—make a weird and tragic picture one does not forget.

It was not until he met a body of French infantry, also leaving Paris, that the frenzied Emperor would stop, and even then he would not retrace his steps. He sent Caulaincourt to make a last appeal to Alexander of Russia, he who had risen in the theatre at Erfurth to take Napoleon's hand when the actor recited, "The friendship of a great man is a gift of the gods."

A messenger was sent to Marmont, and the Emperor waited in the road to receive his answer; nine miles, and not much more than an hour, being the tantalizing margin upon which, again, fate had traced the words, "Too late." Only the river separated him from the out-posts of the enemy; their campfires could be seen by reflection in the distance, and yonder to the west was the dull glare hanging over Paris—Paris where a hundred thousand men were ready to fight, if only a leader would show them how!

Leaden must have been the feet of those hours, infinite the woe of that most impatient of men, that haughtiest of men, that self-consciously ablest of men, as he tramped restlessly back and forth on the bleak hill in the dark, awaiting the answers from his messengers.

At last he was almost forced into his carriage and driven back to Fontainebleau. Making his way to one of the humblest rooms, he fell upon the bed, exhausted, heart-broken.

NAPOLEON'S REFORMS

From 'Napoleon.' Copyright, The Macmillan Company, and used here by permission of the author and the publishers.

NOTHING but memories now remain to France, or to the human race of the splendors of Marengo, of Austerlitz, Jena and Wagram; but the work which Napoleon did while Europe allowed him a few years of peace will endure for ages. Had the Treaty of Amiens been lasting, had England kept faith, had the old world dynasties been willing to accept at that time those necessary changes which have since cost so much labor, blood and treasure, Napoleon might have gone down to history, not as the typical fighter of modern times, but as the peerless developer, organizer, administrator and lawgiver. In his many-sided character there was the well-rounded man of peace, who delighted in improvement, in embellishment, in the growth of commerce, agriculture, and manufactures; in the progress of art, science, and literature; in the thorough training of the young, the care of the weaker members of society, the just administration of wise laws, the recognition of merit of all kinds. The orderly march of the legions of industry was not less satisfying to him than the march of armies. We have read so much of his battles that we have come to think of him as a man who was never so happy as when at war. This view is superficial and incorrect. It appears that he was never more energetic, capable, effective, never more at ease, never more cheerful, contented, kind, and magnetic than in the work connected with his schools, hospitals, public monuments, public improvements of all sorts, the codification of the laws, the encouragement and development of the vast industries of France. No trophy of any of his campaigns did he exhibit with more satisfaction than he took in showing to visitors a piece of sugar made by Frenchmen from the beet—a triumph of home industry due largely to his stimulating impulse.

In all such matters his interest was intelligent, persistent, and intense. Few were the months given to him in which to devote himself to such labor; but he took enormous strides in constructing a new system for France which worked wonders for her, and which has had its influence throughout the civilized world.

The men of the Revolution had sketched a grand scheme of state education, but it remained a sketch. Napoleon studied their scheme, improved it, adopted it, and put it into successful operation. His thorough system of instruction, controlled by the state, from the primary schools to the Lyceums and the Technological Institute remains in France to-day substantially as he left them.

Under the Directory society had become disorganized and morals corrupt. Napoleon, hard at work on finance, laws, education, military and civil administration, inaugurated the reform of social abuses also. With his removal to the Tuileries, February, 1800, may be dated the reconstruction of society in France. The beginnings of a court formed about him, and into this circle the notoriously immoral women could not enter. It must have been a cruel surprise to Madame Tallien—coming to visit her old friend Josephine—when the door was shut in her face by the usher. Of course it was by Napoleon's command that this was done, never by Josephine's. Applying similar rules to the men, Napoleon compelled Talleyrand to marry the woman with whom he openly lived; and even the favorite Berthier, too scandalously connected with Madame Visconti, was made to take a wife. Sternly frowning upon all flaunting immoralities, the First Consul's will power and example so impressed itself upon the nation that the moral tone of society throughout the land was elevated, and a loftier moral standard fixed.

Under the Directory the material well-being of the country, internally, had been so neglected that even the waterways fell into disuse. Under the consular government the French system of internal improvement soon began to excite the admiration of Europe. Englishmen, coming over after the peace, and seeing what their editors and politicians had described as a country ruined by revolution, were amazed to see that in many directions French progress could give England useful lessons. Agriculture had doubled its produce, for the idle lands of former grandeues had been put under cultivation. The farmer was more prosperous, for the lord was not on the lookout to seize the crop with feudal dues as soon as made. Nor was the priest seen standing at the gate, grabbing a tenth of everything. Nor were state taxes levied with an eye single to making the burden as heavy as peasant shoulders could bear.

Wonder of wonders! the man in control had said and kept saying, "Better to let the peasant keep what he makes than to lock it up in the public treasury!" The same man said, "Beautify the markets, render them clean, attractive, healthy—they are the Louvres of the common people." It was such a man who would talk with the poor whenever he could, to learn the facts of their condition. In his stroll he would stop, chat with the farmers, and, taking the plow in his own white hands, trace a wobbly furrow.

Commerce was inspired to new efforts, for the First Consul put himself forward as champion of liberty of the seas, combatting England's harsh policy of searching neutral vessels and seizing goods covered by the neutral flag.

Manufacture he encouraged to the utmost of his power, by shutting off foreign competition, by setting the example of using home-made goods, by direct subsidies. He even went so far as to experiment with the government warehouse plan, advancing money out of the treasury to the manufacturers on the deposit of the products of the mills.

No drone, be he the haughtiest Montmorency, whose ancestor had been in remote ages a murderer and a thief, could hold office under Napoleon. Unless he were willing to work, he could not enter into the hive. For the first time in the political life of the modern French, men became prouder of the fact that they were workers, doers of notable deeds, than that they were the cousin of some spindle-shanked duke whose great-great-grandfather had held the stirrup when Louis XIII had straddled his horse.

Having founded the Bank of France, January, 1800, Napoleon jealously scrutinized its management, controlled its operations, and made it useful to the state as well as to the bankers. He watched the quotation of government securities, took pride in seeing them command high prices, and considered it a point of honor that they should not fall below eighty. When they dropped considerably below that figure, some years later, the Emperor went into the market, made a campaign against the bears and forced the price up again—many a crippled bear limping painfully off the lost field.

The First Consul also elaborated a system of state education. Here he was no Columbus, no creator, no original inventor. His glory is that he accomplished what others had suggested, had attempted, but had not done. He took hold, gave the scheme the benefit of his tremendous driving force, and pushed it through. It will be his glory forever that in all things pertaining to civil life he was the highest type of democrat. Distinctions of character, merit, conduct, talent, he could understand; distinctions of mere birth he abhorred. The very soul of his system was the rewarding of worth. In the army, the civil service, the schools, in art and science and literature, his great object was to discover the real men—the men of positive ability—and to open to these the doors of preferment.

Early in his consulate he began the great labor of codifying the laws of France—a work which had often been suggested and which the Convention had partially finished, but which had never been completed.

To realize the magnitude of the undertaking we must bear in mind that, under the Old Order, there were all sorts of laws and all kinds of courts. What was right in one province was wrong in another. A citizen who was familiar with the system in Languedoc would have found himself grossly ignorant in Brittany. Roman law, feudal law, royal edicts, local customs, seigniorial mandates, municipal practices, varied and clashed throughout the realm. The Revolution had prostrated the old system and had proposed to establish one uniform, modern and equitable code of law for the whole country; but the actual carrying out of the plan was left to Napoleon.

Calling to his aid the best legal talent of the land, the First Consul set to work. Under his supervision the huge task was completed, after the steady labor of several years. The Civil Code and the Code of Civil Procedure, and the Criminal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure, were the four parts of the completed system which, adopted in France, followed the advance of the Empire and still constitutes the law of a large portion of the civilized world.

Every statute passed under Napoleon's eye. He presided over the meetings when the finished work of the codifiers came up for sanction, and his suggestions, reasoning, experience, and natural wisdom left their impress upon every page. "Never did we adjourn," said one of the colaborers of Napoleon, "without learning something we had not known before."

It is the glory of this Code that it put into final and permanent shape the best work of the Revolution. It was based upon the great principle that all citizens were legally equals; that primogeniture, hereditary nobility, class privileges and exemptions were unjust; that property was sacred; that conscience was free; that state employment should be open to all, opportunities equal to all, state duties and state burdens the same to all; that laws should be simple and legal proceedings public, swift, cheap and just; and that personal liberty, civil right, should be inviolable.

Recognizing his right as master-builder, his persistence, zeal, active co-operation in the actual work, and the modern tone which he gave to it, the world does him no more than justice in calling it the Code Napoleon.

ANALYSIS OF JEFFERSON

From 'Life and Times of Thomas Jefferson.' Copyright, D. Appleton and Company, and used here by permission of the author and the publishers.

. . . SERENELY happy is the master of Monticello, in these quiet years before the war. He makes and he spends, labors where work is not toil, loves and is loved, is in perfect health of body and of mind, and to him the world is bathed in sunlight. Little Martha, the first-born, begins to toddle about the house.

Husband, father, master, neighbor—he is kind to everybody. He loves to see bright faces about him. He loves to give pleasure to others. He would no sooner hurt the feelings of any mortal wilfully than he would steal.

Never fretting, scolding, worrying; never clouding the sunniness of to-day by forebodings about the morrow; never souring the milk of human kindness by scowls, sarcasm, reproaches, wrangles, or malicious gossip, he drew on the bank of the present for every legitimate pleasure that stood to his credit. He believed that the surest way to happiness was the making of others happy. This gospel he preached and practiced ; serenely confident and contented, he hums softly as he paces about his mountain home, measuring everything with a tape-line, weighing everything with steel-yards, probing everything with questions, calculating everything with pen or pencil, seeing to everything with his own eyes ; and then, at night, or at some odd hour during the day, jotting it down in those faithful books.

A variedly industrious, widely intelligent, eminently companionable, nobly aspiring, warm-hearted, benevolent, bright-tempered man.

Just the kind of man a stranger would apply to, a beggar hunt up, a cynic shun, a bigot hate, a sharper pursue, a scholar delight in, a patriot trust, a neighbor love and impose on, a shyster outwit, visitors make a convenience of, over-seers bankrupt, philosophers esteem, fellow-statesmen respect, enemies ridicule, as often as they hated, friends blindly follow, sincerely respect, and good-naturedly joke at ; children adore, and a pure, high-minded wife worship with boundless affection.

Mixed sunlight and shadow was in this character, as in all others, flaws, foibles, follies—the gold not wholly free and pure ; but as nearly deserving unmixed affection and admiration as any son of Adam whose hands were ever given from youth to age to the moulding of better laws, better institutions, better conditions for the human race.

HENRY WATTERSON

[1840—]

ROBERT W. BINGHAM

HENRY WATTERSON was born in Washington, District of Columbia, February 16, 1840, at which time his father, the Honorable Harvey Magee Watterson, was a member of Congress from Tennessee. His mother, Tabitha Black Watterson, was a member of a prominent Tennessee family, and on both sides Mr. Watterson inherited traditions of courage, culture, and breeding. Owing to a defect in vision, he was educated chiefly by private tutors, though he passed four years at the Protestant Episcopal Academy in Philadelphia. He was designed originally for a musical career, and was carefully taught by the best masters, but, losing the action of one of his hands, he was diverted to musical criticism, and thence graduated into journalism. When only eighteen, he was a staff writer on the Washington States, continuing with that paper until he went South in 1861. He was also sub-editor of the Democratic Review in 1860. In 1861 he entered the Confederate service as a staff officer, and in 1864 he rose to be chief of scouts in General Johnston's Army. He was connected with the Chattanooga Rebel during ten months in 1862 and 1863. In 1865 he married Miss Rebecca Ewing, daughter of the Honorable Andrew Ewing of Nashville, and remained in Nashville until 1867 as editor of the Republican Banner.

During the winter of 1867-'68 Mr. Watterson was invited to Louisville to become the successor of Mr. George D. Prentice as editor of the Journal. After a sharp rivalry of half a year with Mr. W. N. Haldeman, owner and publisher of the Courier, at the end of which period the two papers divided about equally a rather limited newspaper field, Mr. Haldeman and Mr. Watterson joined their forces and purchased the Louisville Democrat, and thus created the Courier-Journal. The initial number of the new paper appeared Sunday, November 8, 1868. Mr. Watterson has been its editor from that day to this. Mr. Haldeman, who died in 1902, was president of the company and its publisher.

Mr. Watterson accepted an election to fill an unexpired term in Congress and served as a member of the Ways and Means Committee and as chairman of the Democratic Steering Committee from August, 1876, to March, 1877. He declined a reelection and resumed his editorship of the Courier-Journal. In 1876 he served as temporary chairman of the National Democratic Convention, and in 1880, 1884, 1888 and 1892 as chairman of the Platform Committees of the National Democratic Conventions. The University of the South conferred the degree of D.C.L. upon him in 1891, and Brown University followed with the degree of LL.D. in 1906. In 1882 he published 'Oddities of Southern Life and Character,' in 1899, 'History of the Spanish-American War,' and in 1902 a collection of his addresses, lectures, and sketches was published under the title 'The Compromises of Life,' of which a new edition was issued in 1906, containing additional material. For many years Mr. Watterson has held undisputed primacy among the editors of the United States.

A review of the great names in this branch of intellectual achievement and activity must begin with his, as, indeed, it must end with his, for he seems to have no successor. He was the equal of his greatest rivals in those particulars in which they excelled, for Dana was no greater satirist, Godkin no finer critic nor scholar, Greeley no stronger advocate, and, the peer of each at his best, he was the master of each in other respects. It is impossible to do justice to the work of such a writer, even in an extended biographical treatise, and altogether so in a fragmentary sketch such as this, for the "best evidence" of genius is its own product. To this end, out of Mr. Watterson's work which is preserved in permanent form, two selections have been made in an attempt to give an idea of his gifts as a writer. These, and all of his work, will repay perusal, for few writers in our time have possessed a style so rich and vigorous, a knowledge of men and affairs so varied and profound, an imagination so vivid, a humor so truly delicious. For many years he has been absolutely the head of his profession in this country, and has wielded a tremendous influence, not only in his own State, but in the Nation as well. Still active, vigorous, and unafraid, his genius undimmed, he furnishes knowledge, enthusiasm, and pleasure to his thousands of daily readers, and wears, by the verdict of the whole American people, the well-earned title, "the greatest editor of his time."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

From an Address delivered at Lincoln Union, Auditorium, Chicago, February 12, 1895. Copyright, Duffield and Company, and used here by permission of the author and the publishers.

THE statesmen in knee-breeches and powdered wigs who signed the Declaration of Independence and framed the Constitution—the soldiers in blue-and-buff, top-boots, and epaulets who led the armies of the Revolution—were what we are wont to describe as gentlemen. They were English gentlemen. They were not all, nor even generally, scions of the British aristocracy; but they came, for the most part, of good Anglo-Saxon and Scotch-Irish stock.

The shoe-buckle and the ruffled shirt worked a spell peculiarly their own. They carried with them an air of polish and authority. Hamilton, though of obscure birth and small stature, is represented by those who knew him to have been dignity and grace personified; and old Ben Franklin, even in woollen hose, and none too courtier-like, was the delight of the great nobles and fine ladies, in whose company he made himself as much at home as though he had been born a marquis.

When we revert to that epoch the beauty of the scene which history unfolds is marred by little that is uncouth, by nothing that is grotesque. The long procession passes, and we see in each group, in every figure, something of heroic proportion. John Adams and John Hancock, Joseph Warren and Samuel Adams, the Livingstons in New York, the Carrolls in Maryland, the Masons, the Randolphs, and the Pendletons in Virginia, the Rutledges in South Carolina—what pride of caste, what elegance of manner, what dignity and dominancy of character! And the soldiers! Israel Putnam and Nathanael Greene, Ethan Allen and John Stark, Mad Anthony Wayne and Light Horse Harry Lee, and Morgan and Marion and Sumter, gathered about the immortal Washington—Puritan and Cavalier so mixed and blended as to be indistinguishable the one from the other—where shall we go to seek a more resplendent galaxy of field-marshal? Surely not to Blenheim, drinking beakers to Marlborough after the famous victory; nor yet to the silken marquée of the great Condé on the Rhine, bedizened with gold lace and radiant with the flower of the nobility of France! Ah, me! there were gentlemen in those days; and they made their influence felt upon life and thought long after the echoes of Bunker Hill and Yorktown had faded away, long after the bell over Independence Hall had ceased to ring.

The first half of the Republic's first half-century of existence the public men of America, distinguished for many things, were chiefly and almost universally distinguished for repose of bearing and sobriety of behavior. It was not until the institution of African slavery had got into politics as a vital force that Congress became a bear-garden, and that our law-makers, laying aside their manners with their small-clothes, fell into the loose-fitting habiliments of modern fashion and the slovenly jargon of partisan controversy. The gentlemen who signed the Declaration and framed the Constitution were succeeded by gentlemen—much like themselves—but these were succeeded by a race of party leaders much less decorous and much more self-confident; rugged, puissant; deeply moved in all they said and did, and sometimes turbulent; so that finally, when the volcano burst forth flames that reached the heavens, great human boulders appeared amid the glare on every side; none of them much to speak of according to rules regnant at St. James's and Versailles, but vigorous, able men, full of their mission and of themselves, and pulling for dear life in opposite directions.

There were Seward and Sumner and Chase, Corwin and Ben Wade, Trumbull and Fessenden, Hale and Collamer and Grimes, and Wendell Phillips and Horace Greeley, our latter-day Franklin. There were Toombs and Hammond, and Slidell and Wigfall, and the two little giants, Douglas and Stephens, and Yancey and Mason, and Jefferson Davis. With them soft words buttered no parsnips, and they cared little how many pitchers might be broken by rude ones. The issue between them did not require a diagram to explain it. It was so simple a child might understand. It read, human slavery against human freedom, slave labor against free labor, and involved a conflict as inevitable as it was irrepressible.

Long before the guns of Beauregard opened fire upon Fort Sumter, and, fulfilling the programme of extremism, "blood was sprinkled in the faces of the people," the hustings in America had become a battle-ground, and every rood of debatable territory a ring for controversial mills, always tumultuous, and sometimes sanguinary. No sooner had the camp-fires of the Revolution—which warmed so many noble hearts and lighted so many patriotic lamps—no sooner had the camp-fires of the Revolution died out, than there began to burn, at first fitfully, then to blaze alarmingly in every direction, a succession of forest fires, baffling the energies and resources of the good and brave men who sought to put them out. Mr. Webster, at once a learned jurist and a prose poet, might thunder expositions of the written law, to quiet the fears of the slave-owner and to lull the waves of agitation. Mr. Clay, by his resistless eloquence and overmastering personality, might compromise first one and then another of the irreconcilable conditions that threw themselves across the pathway of conservative statesmanship. To no purpose, except to delay the fatal hour.

There were moving to the foreground moral forces which would down at no man's bidding. The still, small voice of emancipation, stifled for a moment by self-interest playing upon the fears of the timid, recovered its breath and broke into a cry for abolition. The cry for abolition rose in volume to a roar. Slowly, step by step, the forces of freedom advanced to meet the forces of slavery. Gradually, these mighty, discordant elements approached the predestined line of battle; the gains for a while seeming to be in doubt, but in reality all on one side. There was less and less of middle-ground. The middle-men who ventured to get in the way were either struck down or absorbed by the one party or the other. The Senate had its Gettysburg; and many and many a Shiloh was fought on the floor of the House. Actual war raged in Kansas. The mysterious descent upon Harper's Ferry, like a fire-bell in the night, might have warned all men of the coming conflagration; might have revealed to all men a prophecy in the lines that, quoted to describe the scene, foretold the event—

The rock-ribbed ledges drip with a silent horror of blood,
And Echo there, whatever is asked her, answers: "Death."

Greek was meeting Greek at last; and the field of politics became almost as sulphurous and murky as an actual field of battle.

Amid the noise and confusion, the clashing of intellects like sabres bright, and the booming of the big oratorical guns of the North and the South, now definitely arrayed, there came one day into the Northern camp one of the oddest figures imaginable; the figure of a man who, in spite of an appearance somewhat at outs with Hogarth's line of beauty, wore a serious aspect, if not an air of command, and, pausing to utter a single sentence that might be heard above the din, passed on and for a moment disappeared. The sentence was pregnant with meaning. The man bore a commission from God on high! He said: "A house divided against itself cannot stand. I believe this Government cannot endure permanently half free and half slave. I do not expect the Union to be dissolved; I do not expect the house to fall; but I do expect it will cease to be divided." He was Abraham Lincoln. . . .

I met the newly elected President the afternoon of the day in the early morning of which he had arrived in Washington. It was a Saturday, I think. He came to the Capitol under Mr. Seward's escort, and, among the rest, I was presented to him. His appearance did not impress me as fantastically as it had impressed Colonel McClure. I was more familiar with the Western type than Colonel McClure, and while Mr. Lincoln was certainly not an Adonis, even after prairie ideals, there was about him a dignity that commanded respect.

I met him again the forenoon of March 4 in his apartment at Willard's Hotel as he was preparing to start to his inauguration, and was touched by his unaffected kindness; for I came with a matter requiring his immediate attention. He was entirely self-possessed; no trace of nervousness; and very obliging. I accompanied the cortège that passed from the Senate chamber to the vast portico of the Capitol, and, as Mr. Lincoln removed his hat to face the vast multitude in front and below, I extended my hand to receive it, but Judge Douglas, just beside me, reached over my outstretched arm and took the hat, holding it throughout the delivery of the inaugural address. I stood near enough to the speaker's elbow not to obstruct any gestures he might make, though he made but few; and then it was that I began to comprehend something of the power of the man.

He delivered that inaugural address as if he had been delivering inaugural addresses all his life. Firm, resonant, earnest, it announced the coming of a man; of a leader of men; and in its ringing tones and elevated style, the gentlemen he had invited to become members of his political family—each of whom thought himself a bigger man than his master—might have heard the voice and seen the hand of a man born to command. Whether they did or not, they very soon ascertained the fact. From the hour Abraham Lincoln crossed the threshold of the White House to the hour he went thence to his death, there was not a moment when he did not dominate the political and military situation and all his official subordinates.

He was himself a Southern man. He and all his tribe were Southerners. Although he left Kentucky when but a child, he was an old child; he never was very young; and he grew to manhood in a Kentucky colony; for what was Illinois in those days but a Kentucky colony, grown since somewhat out of proportion? He was in no sense what we in the South used to call "a poor white." Awkward, perhaps; ungainly, perhaps, but aspiring; the spirit of a hero beneath that rugged exterior; the soul of a prose-poet behind those heavy brows; the courage of a lion back of those patient, kindly aspects; and, before he was of legal age, a leader of men. His first love was a Rutledge; his wife was a Todd.

Let the romancist tell the story of his romance. I dare not. No sadder idyl can be found in all the short and simple annals of the poor.

We know that he was a prose-poet; for have we not that immortal prose-poem recited at Gettysburg? We know that he was a statesman; for has not time vindicated his conclusions? But the South does not know, except as a kind of hearsay, that he was a friend; the sole friend who had the power and the will to save it from itself. He was the one man in public life who could have come to the head of affairs in 1861, bringing with him none of the embittered resentments growing out of the anti-slavery battle. While Seward, Chase, Sumner, and the rest had been engaged in hand-to-hand combat with the Southern leaders at Washington, Lincoln, a philosopher and a statesman, had been observing the course of events from afar, and like a philosopher and a statesman. The direst blow that could have been laid upon the prostrate South was delivered by the assassin's bullet that struck him down.

His was the genius of common-sense; of common-sense in action; of common-sense in thought; of common-sense enriched by experience and unhindered by fear. "He was a common man," says his friend, Joshua Speed, "expanded into giant proportions; well acquainted with the people, he placed his hand on the beating pulse of the nation, judged of its disease, and was ready with a remedy." Inspired he was truly, as Shakespeare was inspired; as Mozart was inspired; as Burns was inspired; each, like him, sprung directly from the people.

I look into the crystal globe that, slowly turning, tells the story of his life, and I see a little heart-broken boy, weeping by the outstretched form of a dead mother, then bravely, nobly trudging a hundred miles to obtain her Christian burial. I see this motherless lad growing to manhood amid scenes that seem to lead to nothing but abasement; no teachers; no books; no chart, except his own untutored mind, no compass, except his own undisciplined will; no light, save light from Heaven; yet, like the caravel of Columbus, struggling on and on through the trough of the sea, always towards the destined land. I see the full-grown man, stalwart and brave, an athlete in activity of movement and strength of limb, yet vexed by weird dreams and visions; of life, of love, of religion, sometimes verging on despair. I see the mind, grown at length as robust as the body, throw off these phantoms of the imagination and give itself wholly to the work-a-day uses of the world; the rearing of children; the earning of bread; the multiplied duties of life. I see the party leader, self-confident in conscious rectitude, original, because it was not his nature to follow; potent, because he was fearless, pursuing his convictions with earnest zeal, and urging them upon his fellows with the resources of an oratory which was hardly more impressive than it was many-sided. I see him, the preferred among his fellows, ascend the eminence reserved for him, and him alone of all the statesmen of the time, amid the derision of opponents and the distrust of supporters, yet unawed and unmoved, because thoroughly equipped to meet the emergency. The same being, from first to last; the poor child weeping over a dead mother; the great chief sobbing amid the cruel horrors of war; flinching never from duty, nor changing his life-long ways of dealing with the stern realities which pressed upon him and hurried him onward. And, last scene of all, that ends this strange, eventful history, I see him lying dead there in the Capitol of the nation, to which he had rendered "the last, full measure of his devotion," the flag of his country around him, the world in mourning, and, asking myself how could any man have hated that man, I ask you, how can any man refuse his homage to his memory?

HOME-COMING

From an Address of Welcome delivered in Louisville, June 13, 1906. Copyright, Duffield and Company, and used here by permission of the author and the publishers.

ONCE a Kentuckian, always a Kentuckian. From the cradle to the grave, the arms of the mother-land, stretched forth in mother-love—the bosom of the mother-land, immortal as the ages, yet mortal in maternal affection, warmed by the rich, red blood of Virginia—the voice of the mother-land, reaching the farthest corners of the earth in tones of Heavenly music—summon the errant to the roof-tree's shade and bid the wanderer home. What wanderer yet was ever loath to come? Whether upon the heights of fortune and fame or down amid the shadows of the valley of death and despair, the true Kentuckian, seeing the shining eyes and hearing the mother-call, sends back the answering refrain—

Where'er I roam, whatever realms I see,
My heart, untravelled, fondly turns to thee.

Behold in this great, exultant multitude, the proof! . . .

The star that shone above him [the Kentuckian] and led him on was love of liberty, the beacon of his dreams, the light of the fireside. He cut a clearing in the wild-wood and called it Home. He read not Romance, he made it; nor Poetry, he lived it. His the Forest Epic, the Iliad of the cane-brake, the Odyssey of the frontier, the unconscious prose-poem of the rifle and the camp, the block-house and the plough, the Holy Bible and the Old-Field School!

Happy the man who has sat in childhood upon a well-loved grandsire's knee, awed by the telling of the wondrous tale; how, even as the Dardanæ followed Æneas, the Virginians followed Boone; the route from Troy to Tiber not wearier nor flanked by greater hazard than that betwixt the shores of the Chesapeake and the Falls of the Ohio; the mountains standing, gorgon-like, across the pathless way, as if, defending each defile, to hold inviolate some dread, forbidden secret; the weird wastes of wilderness beyond; the fordless stream; the yawning chasm; the gleam of the tomahawk and the hiss of the serpent; yet ever onward, spite of the haunting voice of the elements, stripped for the death-struggle with man, spite of the silence and the solitude of reluctant Nature, like some fawn-eyed maiden, resisting his rude intrusion; ever onward; before him the promised land of the hunter's vision; in his soul the grace of God, the fear of hell, and the love of Virginia!

God bless Virginia! Heaven smile upon her as she prepares to celebrate with fitting rite three centuries of majestic achievement, the star-crown upon her brow, the distaff in her hand, nor spot nor blur to dim the radiance of her shield!

They came, the Virginians, in their homespun, in quest of homes; their warrant their rifles; their payment the blood of heroes; nor yet forgetting a proverb the Chinese have that "it needs a hundred men to make a fortress, but only a woman can make a home"—for they were quick to go back for their women; their wives and their sweethearts; our grandmothers who stood by their side, beautiful and dauntless, to load their fowling-pieces, to dress their wounds, to cheer them on to battle, singing their simple requiem over the dead at Boonesborough, and bringing water from the spring at Bryan's Station, heart-broken only when the news came back from the River Raisin.

I am here to welcome you in the name of all the people of this lovely city, in the name of all the people of this renowned Commonwealth, to welcome you as kith and kin; but you will not expect me, I am sure, to add thereto more than the merest outline of the history of Kentucky, as it is known to each and every one of you, from the time when the pathfinders, under the lead of Harrod and Henderson, of Boone and Kenton, blazed their way through the forest, and the heroes, led by Logan and Shelby, by Scott and Clark, rescued the land from the savage, to the hour which smiles upon us here this day; a history resplendent with illustrious names and deeds; separating itself into three great epochs and many episodes and adventures in woodcraft and warcraft and statecraft; the period of the Clays, the Breckinridges, and the Crittendens, with its sublime struggle to preserve the union of the States as it had come down to them from the Revolution, with always the Marshalls and the Wickliffes, the Boyles and the Rowans, the Johnsons and the Browns, the Adairs, the Deshas, and the McDowells, somewhere at the fore—"Old Ben Hardin" having a niche all to himself—none of them greater than he; the period of the War of Sections, when even the Clays, the Crittendens, and the Breckinridges were divided; when for a season the skies were hung in sable and all was dark as night, the very sacrifices that had gone before seeming to have been made in vain, the "dark and bloody ground" of barbaric fancy, come into actual being through the passions and mistakes of Christian men; and, finally, the period after the War of Sections, when the precept "once a Kentuckian, always a Kentuckian," was met by the answering voice, "blood is thicker than water," and the Goodloes, the Ballards, and the Speeds, the Harlans, the Frys, and the Murrays, clasped their hands across the breach and made short shift of the work of reconstruction with the Buckners, the Prestons, and the Dukes. Thus is it that here at least the perplexed grandchild cannot distinguish between the grizzled grandfather who wore the blue and the grizzled grandfather who wore the gray.

Kentucky, which gave Abraham Lincoln to the North and Jefferson Davis to the South, contributing a very nearly equal quota of soldiers to each of the contending armies of that great conflict—in point of fact, as many fighting men as had ever voted in any election—a larger per centum of the population than has ever been furnished in time of war by any modern State—Kentucky, thus rent by civil feud, was first to know the battle was ended and to draw together in reunited brotherhood. Kentucky struck the earliest blow for freedom, furnished the first martyrs to liberty, in Cuba. It was a Crittenden, smiling before a file of Spanish musketry, refusing to be blindfolded or to bend the knee for the fatal volley, who uttered the key-note of his race, "A Kentuckian always faces his enemy and kneels only to his God." It was another Kentuckian, the gallant Holman, who, undaunted by the dread decimation, the cruel death-by-lot, having drawn a white bean for himself, brushed his friend aside and drew another in his stead. Ah, yes; we have our humors along with our heroics, and laugh anon at ourselves, and our mishaps and our jokes; but we are nowise a bloody-minded people; the rather a sentimental, hospitable, kindly people, caring perhaps too much for the picturesque and too little for consequences. Though our jests be sometimes rough, they are robust and clean. We are a provincial people and we rejoice in our provincialism. We have always piqued ourselves upon doing our love-making and our law-making, as we do our ploughing, in a straight furrow; and yet it is true that Kentucky never encountered darker days than came upon us when the worst that can befall a Commonwealth seemed passed and gone. The stubborn war between the Old Court party and the New Court party was bitter enough; but it was not so implacable as the strife which strangely began with the discussion of an honest difference of opinion touching a purely economic question, of National, not State, policy. Can there be one living Kentuckian who does not look back with horror and amazement upon the passions and incidents of those evil days? . . .

I have stood upon the margin of a distant sea and watched the ships go by, envious that their prows were Westward bent. I have marked the glad waves dancing to the setting sun, heart-sick with thoughts of home. And thus wistful, yearning, ready to take my dearest enemy by the hand and forgive him, yea, to sop gravy with him out of the self-same dish, those words of the vagabond poet, whose sins the Recording Angel long ago blotted out of his book, have come to me and sung to me and cheered me, even as a mother's lullaby:

In all my wanderings round this world of care,
In all my griefs—and God has given my share—
I still had hopes my latest hours to crown,
Amid these rural scenes to lay me down,

To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flame from wasting by repose,
I still had hopes—for pride attends us still—
Among the swains to show my book-learned skill,
Around my fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all I felt and all I saw,
And as a hare whom hounds and horns pursue,
Pants to the place from whence at first he flew,
I still had hopes my long vexations past,
Here to return and die at home at last.

* * * * *

You, too, friends and brothers—Kentuckians each and every one—you, too, Home again; this your castle, Kentucky's flag, not wholly hid beneath the folds of the Nation's, above it; this your cottage, Kentucky-like the latch-string upon the outer side; but, whether castle or cottage, an altar and a shrine for faithful hearts and hallowed memories. Be sure from yonder skies they look down upon us this day; the immortal ones who built this Commonwealth, and left it consecrate, a rich inheritance and high responsibility to you and me; who, like the father of Daniel Webster, shrank from no danger, no toil, no sacrifice, to serve their country and raise their children to a condition better than their own. In God's name, and in Kentucky's name, I bid you something more than welcome: I bid you know and feel, and carry yourselves, as if you knew and felt that you are no longer dreaming, that this is actually God's country, your native soil, that, standing knee deep in blue-grass, you stand full length in all our homes and all our hearts!

HOWARD WEEDEN

[1847—1905]

F. P. GAMBLE

HOWARD WEEDEN was one of the many Southern writers who, almost by accident, have written of the simple things near at hand, and by the truth and beauty of their portrayal have given these themes a universal and abiding quality. The locality from which she drew her inspiration was the picturesque region of northern Alabama. Here she was surrounded by the finest traditions and survivals of the Old South. The country had been settled by the best class of Virginians who had brought with them a brave heritage of gentle breeding, courage, and the nobler qualities of gentlemen. They established fair and peaceful homes, and in them, during years of wealth and ease, slavery existed at its best. But this idyllic society was doomed to a swift passing. The war destroyed its wealth and broke all bonds between masters and slaves, except the tie of lasting affection. And here, in an atmosphere full of beautiful memories, this daughter of a once reigning house lived as the historian of a vanishing race and a vanishing time. As she says: "The books are but modest songs and verses snatched from the fading remnant of a people now nearly passed away, only valuable because the past is always precious, and only beautiful for being old and gone."

Howard Weeden, the daughter of William Weeden, a Virginian, and of Jane Urquhart, a Georgian, was born in Huntsville, Alabama, July 6, 1847. Her father's family were large cotton planters and slave owners. On her mother's side she inherited her literary instinct through a fine line of Scottish ancestry, with a notable taste for letters. She was educated as a gentlewoman of the time, and was given some small training in painting. This, supplemented by a few lessons on visits to New Orleans, was all the technical instruction she ever received. Yet during the quiet years in the old Huntsville home she painted in oil and water-colors, partly to aid the slender family income, more largely for the pleasure of self-expression. She did not, however, come into her own peculiar field until after the Columbian Exposition in 1893. There she discovered the sketches of negroes by Frost, Kemble, and others. She was impressed by these, but saw "nothing of the old-time 'quality' negro of the South." Remembering this, she made a study in oil of "Uncle Champ," an ancient family servant, and wrote the accompanying verses, "Massa o' de Sheep Fold." Without hurry, and unthinking of fame, she painted her remarkable negro heads and penned the quaint verses, and at last, urged by friends, she sent a little sheaf of both to New York. They were accepted at once, with the request for more. Thus came into being her first book, 'Shadows on the Wall' (1898). During the next six years she brought out 'Bandanna Ballads' (1899), 'Songs of The Old South' (1901), and 'Old Voices' (1904). These thin volumes, each made up of portraits of fine old negroes with a bit of verse opposite, constitute all her work, and on them rests her claim to a small but enduring fame.

She died at her home April 11, 1905. Such is the full record of her life. There was no great tragedy, no picturesque external event to mark its course. She lived quietly and graciously, learning the hearts of her people and recording with a historian's honesty the sadness and beauty around her. Her life was as simple as a garden in a sheltered place, bringing forth a few delicate flowers.

In her work Miss Weeden's achievement is this: Her portraits and poems have caught the spirit of the ante-bellum negro of the finest type—"self-respecting and respected"—and presented it with simplicity and truth. Nothing of the artificial or merely conventional has place. With a deep reverence for reality, she does not depend on a false glamour, romantic tradition, or fanciful background. By study and genius she found the poetry in the unadorned fact. The negro is not made beautiful, but the beauty in him is revealed. He is neither caricatured nor idealized; through his grotesque features and commonplace garb she pierced to the lasting human. Her themes are of his work, his pleasures, his taste for good "vittles," his love for old Marse, his faithfulness, and his hope of crossing Jordan to happiness. Moreover, she pictures, not merely the negro race, but individual negroes, each with a soul and hope of his own. This evidences how deep was her vision. For to most men all negroes seem alike; separated from the white by color and physiognomy, they present only superficial differences of character among themselves. Yet this gentlewoman penetrated to the alien hearts and souls of individuals.

Her greatest contribution to the literature of the South is that she was an interpreter of the happy relation once existing between the slave and his master. "She recorded the passing of that strange brotherhood, the former master and the former slave, old and poor alike, passing away forever." She bears a message to other regions and to a later generation as to the true case when slavery flourished at its happiest. Joel Chandler Harris wrote of her poems: "They will see at once why their mothers and fathers are lamenting the extinction of these fine types of negro men and women reared on the old plantation, independent and yet loyal, forward and yet gentle, captious and yet affectionate, and carrying about with them a flavor of high-breeding, the result of neither apishness nor senility." She discloses in these servants a fidelity so steadfast that one old man wonders why he too does not get a pension after having served "Old Marster" until they both surrendered. This fidelity was founded on a simple faith in the graciousness of the master, as shown in the philosophy of the veteran who says,

"I trust de summer-time to God,
De winter-time to you."

Yet these old men and women limp through her pages full of a dignity and breeding that was no mere imitation of their betters. They often comment on the frailties of their "folks" with shrewdness and wisdom, and keep through everything a childlike simplicity and a gentle, affectionate humor. Perhaps the high note of pathos in this work is the longing of the freed slave for the old days, the wish to forget the hurry and doubt of the present for the memory when restfulness was a virtue and the Master did the worrying.

"An' dere wa'n't nothin' in dem days
Of all dis haste an' noise,
For 'twasn't manners to be fast
When me an' Mis' was boys!"

In all of her work three strains of negro character are discovered: humor, a kind of reminiscent pathos, and religious emotion. For, despite the vulgarity of the false black-face minstrel, the negro is truly humorous, though much of this humor is unconscious. One can almost see the Mammy grinning as she complains because her picture is wanted in the old costume. Her prose answer is just made rhythmic:

"No Lord! my picture can't be caught
By man wid no sich manners;
Dat's 'zactly why de war was fought—
To end dem same bandanners!"

But the negro is not always gay and laughing in the sun. He seems touched with sadness; he is moody and full of sudden sorrows like a child. And like a child he came to Old Marster or Old Mis' to be scolded and comforted. His griefs were perhaps due to his condition of servitude; perhaps also inherited from those who lived in terror of dusks and still dangers of the jungle. Miss Weeden has caught the innate pathos in his eyes and in his words. Likewise, she dwells upon his religious emotions, which, with their queer mingling of faith and superstition, and vague belief in a happier land, were everywhere a part of negro life. Yet religion to him meant not a rule of conduct but the hope of somewhere to rest. And his visions of this abode across "de River" were usually homely reproductions of the best his earthly residence had known—no work, plenty to eat, and God as a kind of beneficent Master to care for him. After the war he dreamed of going to find again the old-time folks and the old-time happiness waiting him.

But these poems are not treatises on the sociology of the negro; they do not attempt to solve "the problem." They do not preach or point morals. They are just natural bits of humor, or wisdom, or love—a flavor of something that has been made to live out of the past. Joel Chandler Harris gave his impression in these fine words: "To me there seems a story behind each picture, and a story is, indeed, hinted at in the tender little verses that face each painting—little verses that flutter across the page as delicately and shy as the falling yellow leaves of the old mimosa that stood near a dear old lady's window years and years ago."

In the technique of her poems Miss Weeden is simple, direct, and faithful to the spirit of her themes. These give no occasion for esthetic decoration. Simplicity and unadornment were the only possible means of expressing her material. She employs dialect, and vernacular or literary English, as the subject demands. The dialect is not carried beyond a reasonable attempt to imitate the habits of speech of the house servants who came much in contact with the whites. It is always lifelike, characteristic, and fits the lips of the real negro. In the poems of other themes than the negro she uses a delicate, pleasing style without self-consciousness or floridity. In judging her work, these lyrics should not be forgotten. The lines on the mockingbird, Christmas in the North and South, and two or three little love songs, are not ambitious, yet beautiful and full of genuine feeling.

There is nothing worldwide or magically rare in her work. But there is fidelity to truth and fitness of expression, and a very great simplicity. "She wrought modesty in clay and realized in truths what may some day aid the historian to explain how a wise and beneficent Providence tempered the outworn institution of slavery with affection and mutual good-will."

MOTHER AND MAMMY

All poems copyrighted by Doubleday, Page and Company, and used here by permission of the publishers.

Among the ranks of shining saints
Disguised in heavenly splendor,
Two Mother-faces wait for me,
Familiar still, and tender.

One face shines whiter than the dawn,
And steadfast as a star;
None but my Mother's face could shine
So bright—and be so far!

The other dark one leans from Heaven,
Brooding still to calm me;
Black as if ebon Rest had found
Its image in my Mammy!

THE OLD BOATMAN

I changed my name when I got free,
To "Mister" like the res',
But now dat I am going Home,
I likes de ol' name bes'.

Sweet voices callin' "Uncle Rome,"
Seem ringin' in my ears;
An' swearin' sort o' sociable,
Ol' Master's voice I hears.

De way he used to call his boat,
Across de river: "Rome!
You damn ol' nigger, come an' bring Dat boat, an' row me home!"

He's passed Heaven's River now, an' soon
He'll call across its foam:
"You, Rome, you damn ol' nigger, loose
Your boat, an' come on Home!"

LEFT BEHIND

When my ole Master took down sick
 I nussed him till he died,
 An' many a pleasant day we had—
 Me sittin' by his side.

We talked about de ole, ole times,
 Part fun, an' part de truth,
 But mostly Master mused on Her,
 De Mistis' of our youth:

She was so bright an' quick, he said,
 She even died dat way—
 An' went before him forty years
 A-smilin'—swif' an' gay:

"But you slow cuss," he said to me,
 "You always was behin'!
 "Come on!" an' wid dat word he went—
 An' lef' his hand in mine!

OLD MIS'

You never knowed Ole Mis', you say?
 Well, dat's a pity, shore;
 De sort of Quality she was
 Is gone—to come no more.

Her gracious word was like a Queen's,
 So kine an' yet so strong;
 We all kep' time to her sof' speech
 Like marchin' to a song.

A nigger didn't dare to die
 Nor marry on our place
 Widout she give her blessin' an'
 Her 'pinion on de case;

She knowed more den de doctors, 'case
God tole her what to give;
She knowed more den de preachers, 'case
God tole her how to live.

Dat ole plantation hit was run
On 'rangements 'bout like dis:
De place hit b'longed to Master, but Ole Master b'longed to Mis'!

WHEN MANNERS WERE IN BLOOM

You say you would paint my manners too
Along wid my head—if you could;
Well, you should have lived in olden times
When manners was really good!

De days was sweet an' warm an' long,
Wid plenty of time to be kine,
An' every one smiled an' bowed an' scraped
An' every one did it fine!

I seem to smell de locust flower
Heavy after rain—
An' de ghostly scent of mimosa blooms
Comes blowin' back again;

An' I feels de fine ole mannerly times
Mix wid de scents till I seem
To see ole Master as natchel as life—
Bow in a kin' of dream:

His manners was certainly quality ways,
De finest dat ever I see;
Dough folks used to laugh an' say dat he took Dem gilt-edged ways from me!

THE WORST OF WAR

When my young master went to war
He carried me wid him too,
An' dough I never fired a shot
Dere was plenty else to do.

He wore de sword an' buttons an' spurs,
An' none was so brave as he;
But never so hard a thing did he do
As the thing he lef' for me.

Where a storm of leaden hail fell thick
He got a ball in his heart
An' died wid a happy smile on his face—
But mine was de harder part:

I led his horse back home where dey sat
Expectin' him—an' I saw Mistis' an' Master's hearts when dey broke—
An' dat was de worst of war!

ME AND MAMMY

Me and Mammy know a child,
About my age and size,
Who, Mammy says, won't go to Heaven
'Cause she's so grown and wise.

She answers "Yes" and "No," just so—
When grown folks speak to her,
And laughs at Mammy and at me,
When I say "Ma'am" and "Sir."

And Mammy says the reason why
This child's in such a plight,
Is 'cause she's had no Mammy dear,
To raise her sweet and right.

To stand between her and the world
With all its old sad noise,
And give her baby-heart a chance
To keep its baby joys.

Then Mammy draws me close to her
And says, "the Lord be praised;
Here's what I calls a decent chile,
'Case hit's been Mammy-raised!"

A VOICE OF THE NIGHT

Wide and warm lies the Southern night,
Steeped in purple dusk;
Calm except for the scented winds
That stir the jessamine's musk,
And silent—until a sudden Voice
Piercing the night is heard,
And the quiet, fragrant world awakes
To the song of a Mocking-bird.

Was it a dream that suddenly stirred
The sleeping bird to bliss
And woke his passionate eager heart
To rapture such as this?
Or was it that, from his lofty nest,
He saw in the East a ray
Of faint but certain dawn—and laughed
Because of Hope and Day!

MASON LOCKE WEEMS

[1759—1825]

ROBERT K. MASSIE

IN the year 1800 appeared what may fairly be considered the first biography of George Washington ever published—a short sketch written by the Reverend Mason Locke Weems. This 'Life of Washington' gained immediate popularity and was soon re-written and enlarged by the author. The enlarged edition proving still more successful, Weems continued to re-write and amplify until, before his death, the book had passed through twenty-one editions and reached its final proportions of an octavo volume of two hundred and fifty pages.

When it is remembered that this book has passed through more than seventy editions, a record equaled by very few books of American authors, and that it was one of the half dozen classics that largely influenced the character and ideals of Abraham Lincoln, it will be seen that its author must be included in any moderately complete list of American writers.

Mason Locke Weems was born in Anne Arundel County, Maryland, October 11, 1759. His father, David Weems, came when a boy from Scotland, and afterward married Esther Hill of Maryland. From this couple is descended the present Weems family of Maryland, founders of the Weems line of steamers.

Mason Weems went to Edinburgh for his education, and is thought to have decided while there to enter the ministry of the Episcopal Church. He had traveled widely as a boy, going with his brother in the latter's sailing-ship on voyages lasting several years. These voyages furnished an outlet for the energies of an active youth, and no doubt helped to give him that interest in men and things, and that breadth of sympathy which afterward characterized him and which is evident in his writings.

In 1782, there being no bishop in America, he went to England seeking Episcopal ordination, and was perhaps ordained by the Bishop of London in the latter part of the year 1784; though there is a family tradition that, owing to his strong American sympathies, he was unable to obtain orders in England and went to Denmark for that purpose. Investigations recently made in London and Copenhagen have failed thus far to settle the matter. There is, however, an interesting letter from Benjamin Franklin to Weems, written July 18, 1784, showing that Weems was then still in England seeking ordination and, finding much difficulty in obtaining it, had asked Franklin's aid. He must have secured his object soon after this, for it is recorded that he became rector of All Hallow's Parish, Anne Arundel County, Maryland, in 1784, and had a female seminary there. In 1791 he moved to Westminster Parish in the same county; two years later he moved to Virginia and settled near the then thriving town of Dumfries, twenty-five miles from Mount Vernon. While living there he frequently preached, during a part of the time at least, at Pohick Church, which is only seven miles from Mount Vernon.

The 'History of Truro Parish,' in which parish Pohick Church is situated, has just been published, but unfortunately there is a gap in its records, and, therefore, the exact nature and date of Weems's connection with Pohick Church can not now be certainly determined, though it is believed by those best informed that he never was regularly settled as rector in the parish. At all events, his personal connection with Washington has been generally exaggerated. Inasmuch as the records show that after 1785 Washington became a regular attendant at Christ Church, Alexandria, services being held irregularly at Pohick, and as Weems's connection with Pohick Church did not begin until toward the close of the century, perhaps not before 1799, the year of Washington's death, Weems can hardly be said ever to have been Washington's rector in any real sense.*

The records of the family show that on July 2, 1795, he married Frances Ewell of Prince William County, Virginia. In 1800 the increasing needs of his family led him to become a traveling book-agent for Matthew Carey, a Philadelphia publisher. With his covered spring wagon packed with books, so arranged in a case that they could be lifted out to display his wares without disturbing them, and with his ever-present fiddle, he traveled through the country from Pennsylvania to South Carolina, selling his books and playing the fiddle during the week, and preaching on Sundays and at any other time the occasion offered. That he was successful along these somewhat varied lines of endeavor is shown by the fact that crowds came to hear him preach the gospel or play the fiddle, as might be, and also that he is said to have sold in one year three thousand high-priced Bibles, as well as many other books.

In 1820 he went to live in Beaufort, South Carolina, and there he died, May 23, 1825. His body was brought back to his wife's home in Virginia for interment. He left a large and well-educated family.

*Dr. Phillip Slaughter, the author of the 'History of Truro Parish,' says: "Towards the close of the century, some say in 1798, the eccentric Mason L. Weems appears on the scene." That Weems was not the pastor of Washington's family, at least during the latter's lifetime, is definitely known from the title-page of the third edition of his 'Life of Washington' which, under date of February 22, 1800, he dedicates to Mrs. Martha Washington and signs himself: "Your sincere though unknown friend." He is known to have been preaching at Pohick Church in 1802.

Of his most important work, his 'Life of Washington,' no one will maintain that it is to be taken as sober and entirely reliable history, for Weems was sadly lacking in the critical faculty to sift and winnow the chaff and select the grain of truth remaining. Neither is it a character study, for he looked at things synthetically rather than analytically, and Washington's character is seen by him as a whole, and is an ideal to be preserved and followed rather than a force to be studied and understood. The book is not so much a biography as a panegyric copiously illustrated with anecdotes. Yet somehow, owing to the author's appreciation of moral excellence, and his overflowing enthusiasm for his subject, the work has a certain vigor and vitality of its own, and has undoubtedly helped to disseminate Washington's fame and to increase the influence of his character. Of the millions who have heard the story of the cherry-tree and the hatchet, few perhaps are aware that that story first saw the light in this book.

Next in importance is his 'Life of General Francis Marion,' which appeared in 1805. In regard to its accuracy as history, it ought perhaps to be mentioned that General Horry, who furnished Weems the material, is said to have disclaimed all responsibility for the book when it appeared. Be this as it may, again has Weems's own contagious enthusiasm imparted a charm and vivacity to the story which will hold the attention of the young reader from beginning to end, while giving him a good idea of the issues at stake in the struggle, as well as a warm admiration for the dashing courage and high character of Francis Marion. It is, on the whole, the most interesting book Weems ever wrote.

The field of biography continuing to attract him, he wrote also lives of Benjamin Franklin and William Penn. His 'Franklin' was written in 1817, and while not comparable in charm and value to Franklin's own story of his life, is yet a readable book and not without a value of its own. The sayings of "Poor Richard," and the numerous anecdotes about Franklin, appealed very strongly to Weems's taste and gave him an unflagging interest in his work, which enabled him to transfer to his pages something of his own glow of feeling.

The 'Life of Penn,' written in 1819, is very much in the same strain. Again do the writer's admiration for the subject of his sketch and his enthusiasm for his work carry us through what would otherwise be a weariness of his endless anecdotes and his maxims of morality.

Weems possessed great activity of mind and body. He visited many places and wrote pamphlets and addresses on many subjects. He had, too, the knack of speaking so that men listened to his words and of writing so that they read what he wrote. An idea of the range of subjects and the character of the author may be gathered from the mere titles of some of his pamphlets:

"The Drunkard's Looking-Glass," a little brochure of sixty-three pages, which ran through six editions and probably did much good.

"God's Revenge Against Duelling."

"God's Revenge Against Murder; or, The Drowned Wife, a Tragedy." This was a pamphlet of forty pages and went through eleven editions.

"God's Revenge Against Gambling, Exemplified in the Miserable Lives and Untimely Deaths of a Number of Persons . . . With Curious and Awful Anecdotes."

"God's Revenge Against Adultery, Awfully Exemplified," etc.

Perhaps it may not be amiss to quote one title-page:

"The Bad Wife's Looking-Glass, or God's Revenge Against Cruelty to Husbands, Exemplified in the Awful History of the Beautiful but Depraved Mrs. Rebecca Cotton, Who Most Inhumanly Murdered Her Husband, John Cotton, Esq., for Which Horrid Act God Permitted Her in the Prime of Life and Bloom of Beauty to be Cut Off by Her Brother, Stephen Kannady, May 5, 1807, with a Number of Incidents and Anecdotes Most Extraordinary and Instructive. M. L. Weems. Second Edition, Improved. Charleston. Printed for the Author 1823. Price 25 cents."

Certainly the prospective purchaser has ample opportunity of knowing beforehand the contents and the cost of this very frank little book.

Not all of his subjects, however, are so lurid and tragic. We find a much more cheerful note in this one:

"Hymen's Recruiting Sergeant, A Tattoo for Old Bachelors."

This is a most elaborate and enthusiastic praise of matrimony, in which one seems to see in the author a man of kindly nature, high ideals and beautiful home life. His point of view may be best seen from a few quotations: "Ye poor leafless Bachelors! ye withered stems of the barren fig." And again, "May there be no more old Bachelors in our land like scrubby oaks standing selfishly alone, while our maidens like tender vines lacking support sink to the ground." He is, however, not indiscriminate in his praise of matrimony. His recollection of Mrs. Rebecca Cotton leads him to say: "Young Brides must remember that to get husbands and to preserve them lovers are very different things." And this further bit of wisdom drops from his pen: "Sweet as Matrimony is, yet it must be owned there are some bitters in it which nothing but love can dulcify."

Weems has suffered many things at the hands of writers of works on American literature. He has been on the whole much neglected, and when he has been mentioned at all, the notices have usually been inadequate and careless, and sometimes obviously inaccurate. For instance, Appleton's 'Cyclopedia of American Biography' says that "Weems was for several years rector of Pohick Church, and about 1790 the necessities of his large family compelled him to resign that charge and become a book agent for Matthew Carey." Perhaps it is asking too much to expect the 'Cyclopedia' to be so technically accurate as to speak of the "rector of Truro Parish" instead of the "rector of Pohick Church," a part of that parish, but a very moderate amount of care would have prevented the mistake of speaking of Weems as having a large family at a date five years before his marriage, and the time, moreover, when Frances Ewell, whom he afterward married, was only fifteen years of age. The careful reader of this paper will detect other inaccuracies in the quotation given above from that 'Cyclopedia.' Even the account in Hayden's 'Virginia Genealogies'—the best account of him to be found anywhere—refers to him as returning to this country as an ordained clergyman in the year 1776, at which time he was only seventeen years old. These instances, and they might be multiplied, are mentioned here in order to show that we cannot too hastily take as final the criticisms of Weems in regard to his character as a man and his reliability as a writer.

Great-hearted Bishop Meade, with his lofty but somewhat narrow standards, did not think highly of Weems as a man and a minister, and almost all subsequent writers on the subject have followed the good bishop in speaking slightly of Weems. Together, they have drawn for us the portrait of a man kind-hearted, indeed, but eccentric in the extreme and seriously lacking in personal dignity, if not in all moral worth. According to these writers, on one occasion we find Weems with his fiddle, seated behind a screen playing for a dance until the screen fell down and, to his great confusion, exposed him to the ridicule of all the company. On another occasion he helped out with his fiddle a company of strolling players, who lacked that instrument for their performance. Again, we are told, he would enter taverns and mimic drunkards in order to draw a crowd and sell his books.

Over against this unprepossessing representation it is well to place the account in Hayden's 'Virginia Genealogies.' The writer, the Rev. A. P. Gray, a clergyman of the Episcopal Church in Virginia, tells us that his informant was the venerable Dr. Jesse Ewell, a nephew of Mrs. M. L. Weems. Dr. Ewell lived for twenty years in Weems's house near Dumfries, and is, therefore, no mean authority as to the real character of the man in question. We learn in that account that Dr. Ewell "loved and esteemed Weems for his piety, his earnest devotion to his work, his intelligence and his gentleness." Dr. Ewell repudiates with indignation the story that Weems played the violin behind the screen for the party of dancers. He gives us a picture of a man of marked peculiarities, indeed, but withal kind and true-hearted. One who in twenty years he had often heard utter words of kindly admonition, but never a hasty reproof—a man who supported his own family comfortably, while giving freely and generously to the needy. His wide experience as a traveler, his knowledge of all classes of men, and his unfailing fund of anecdote made him a most entertaining companion and a welcome guest wherever he went; but he made on men the impression of a man of high character and genuine piety.

An instance of his boyhood is worth recording as throwing light on the character of the man: When a lad of fourteen he was in the habit of leaving the house after supper, and would often be absent until late at night. The family began to be afraid he was getting into corrupt habits, and one night he was followed and was found in an old hut, surrounded by the barefooted and half-clad children of the neighborhood, whom he was in the habit of gathering around him at night in order to give them instruction. That this was not a passing whim, but arose from the deep and permanent impulses of his nature, is seen from a somewhat similar instance, when years later his young companions in London missed him from their company and found him at the bedside of a sick and needy man.

That he was eccentric is universally recognized. On one occasion in his later years, while returning from Leesburg to Dumfries, he came to a stream swollen by the melting snow of early spring. Fearing that the water was deep enough to injure the books in his wagon, he undressed and waded through the stream to measure the depth of the water on his own person to see whether his precious books could go over in safety.

As a writer, Weems has been attacked by his critics even more than as a man. Bishop Meade plainly indicates his lack of confidence in Weems's narratives, and other writers have done the same thing. It is not maintained in this paper that Weems was an accurate and careful historian, sifting true from false and rigidly excluding all that was not well and clearly established; but it seems hardly fair to say, as does Duyckinck's 'Cyclopedia of American Literature': "We believe that Weems would have accounted it a venial, pious fraud to tell any good story to the credit of Washington which came into his head." Practically the same charge is made again and again by other writers about Weems. The conservative remark of Hayden will seem to many people more just and fair: "His anecdotes of the boyhood of Washington are much more easily ridiculed than disproved."

As has been said, he did not possess the critical faculty, and, moreover, his aim was not so much to give a mere narrative of events as to take events and show their moral significance as an inspiration to right conduct. He was, in short, less of a historian than a moralist, and he thought more of the lesson conveyed by the facts than of the facts themselves. He saw the facts through the medium of his glowing imagination and moral enthusiasm; but it is simply misconceiving the whole man to say that his stories are the deliberate invention of falsehood.

He is not one of the great immortals with a message for all time, but yet as a picturesque figure of a bygone age, as a pioneer in disseminating good literature, as a virile and warm-hearted man giving a vivid picture of the age in which he lived and an impulse for good to his own and succeeding generations, he deserves to be held in remembrance.

THE HATCHET AND THE CHERRY TREE

From 'The Life of Washington.'

SOME, when they look up to the oaks, whose giant arms throw a darkening shade over distant acres, or whose single trunk lays the keel of a man-of-war, cannot bear to hear of the time when this mighty plant was but an acorn, which a pig could have demolished. But others, who know their value, like to learn the soil and situation which best produces such noble trees. Thus, parents that are wise, will listen, well pleased, while I relate how moved the steps of the youthful Washington, whose single worth far outweighs all the oaks of Bashan and the red spicy cedars of Lebanon. Yes, they will listen delighted while I tell of their Washington in the days of his youth, when his little feet were swift towards the nests of the birds; or when, wearied in the chase of the butterfly, he laid him down on his grassy couch and slept, while ministering spirits, with their roseate wings, fanned his glowing cheeks, and kissed his lips of innocence with that fervent love which makes the Heaven!

Never did the wise Ulysses take more pains with his beloved Telemachus, than did Mr. Washington with George, to inspire him with an early love of truth. "Truth, George," said he, "is the loveliest quality of youth. I would ride fifty miles, my son, to see the little boy whose heart is so honest, and his lips so pure, that we may depend on every word he says. O how lovely does such a child appear in the eyes of everybody! His parents doat on him. His relations glory in him. They are constantly praising him to their children, whom they beg to imitate him. They are often sending for him to visit them; and receive him, when he comes, with as much joy as if he were a little angel, come to set pretty examples to their children. . . ."

The following anecdote is a case in point. It is too valuable to be lost, and too true to be doubted; for it was communicated to me by the same excellent lady to whom I am indebted for the last.

"When George," said she, "was about six years old, he was made the wealthy master of a hatchet, of which, like most little boys, he was immoderately fond, and was constantly going about chopping everything that came in his way. One day, in the garden, where he often amused himself hacking his mother's pea-sticks, he unluckily tried the edge of his hatchet on the body of a beautiful young English cherry tree, which he barked so terribly, that I don't believe the tree ever got the better of it. The next morning the old gentleman, finding out what had befallen his tree, which, by the by, was a great favourite, came into the house; and with much warmth asked for the mischievous author, declaring at the same time, that he would not have taken five guineas for his tree. Nobody could tell him anything about it. Presently George and his hatchet made their appearance. "George," said his father, "do you know who killed that beautiful little cherry-tree yonder in the garden?" This was a tough question; and George staggered under it for a moment; but quickly recovered himself: and looking at his father, with the sweet face of youth brightened with the inexpressible charm of all-conquering truth, he bravely cried out, "I can't tell a lie, Pa; you know I can't tell a lie. I did cut it with my hatchet." "Run to my arms, you dearest boy," cried his father in transports, "run to my arms: glad am I, George, that you killed my tree; for you have paid me for it a thousand fold. Such an act of heroism in my son is more worth than a thousand trees, though blossomed with silver, and their fruits of purest gold."

THE YOUTH OF WASHINGTON

From 'The Life of Washington.'

SOME of his historians have said, and many believe, that Washington was a Latin scholar! But 'tis an error. He never learned a syllable of Latin. His second and last teacher, Mr. Williams, was indeed a capital hand—but not at Latin; for of that he understood perhaps as little as Balaam's ass. But at reading, spelling, English grammar, arithmetic, surveying, book-keeping, and geography, he was indeed famous. And in these useful arts, 'tis said he often boasted that he had made young George Washington as great a scholar as himself.

Born to be a soldier, Washington early discovered symptoms of nature's intentions towards him. In his 11th year, while at school under old Mr. Hobby, he used to divide his play-mates into two parties or armies. One of these, for distinction sake, was called French, the other American. A big boy at the school, named William Bustle, commanded the former; George commanded the latter. And every day, at play-time, with corn-stalks for muskets, and calabashes for drums, the two armies would turn out, and march, and counter-march, and file off or fight their mimic battles, with great fury. This was fine sport for George, whose passion for active exercise was so strong, that at play-time no weather could keep him within doors. His fair cousins, who visited at his mother's used to complain that "George was not fond of their company, like other boys; but soon as he had got his task, would run out to play." But such trifling play as marbles and tops he could never endure. They did not afford him exercise enough. His delight was in that of the manliest sort, which by stringing the limbs and swelling the muscles promotes the kindest flow of blood and spirits. At jumping with a long pole, or heaving heavy weights, for his years he hardly had an equal. And as to running, the swift-footed Achilles could scarcely have matched his speed.

"Egad! he ran wonderfully," said my amiable and aged friend, John Fitzhugh, Esq., who knew him well. "We had nobody hereabouts, that come near him. There was a young Langhorn Dade, of Westmoreland, a confounded clean-made, tight young fellow, and a mighty swift runner too. But then he was no match for George. Langy, indeed, did not like to give it up; and would brag that he had sometimes brought George to a tie. But I believe he was mistaken; for I have seen them run together many a time; and George always beat him easy enough."

Col. Lewis Willis, his play-mate and kinsman, has been heard to say, that he has often seen him throw a stone across the Rappahannock, at the lower ferry at Fredericksburg. It would be no easy matter to find a man, now-a-days, who could do it.

Indeed his father before him was a man of extraordinary strength. His gun, which to this day is called Washington's fowling-piece, and is now the property of Mr. Harry Fitzhugh, of Chotank, is of such enormous weight, that not one man in fifty can fire it without a rest. And yet throughout that country it is said that he made nothing of holding it off at arm's length, and blazing away at the swans on Potomac; of which he has been known to kill, rank and file, seven or eight at a shot.

But to return to George. It appears that from the start he was a boy of an uncommonly warm and noble heart; insomuch that Lawrence, though but his half-brother, took such a liking to him, even above his own brother Augustine, that he would always have George with him when he could; and often pressed him to come and live with him. But, as if led by some secret impulse, George declined the offer, and as we have seen, went to work in the backwoods, as Lord Fairfax's surveyor! However, when Lawrence was taken with the consumption, and advised by his physician to make a trip to Bermuda, George could not resist any longer, but hastened down to his brother at Mount Vernon, and went with him to Bermuda. It was at Bermuda that George took the small-pox, which marked him rather agreeably than otherwise. Lawrence never recovered, but returned to Virginia, where he died just after his brother George had fought his hard battle against the French and Indians, at Fort Necessity, as the reader will presently learn.

Lawrence did not live to see George after that, but he lived to hear of his fame; for as the French and Indians were at that time a great public terror, the people could not help being very loud in their praise of a youth, who, with so slender a force had dared to meet them in their own country, and had given them such a check.

And when Lawrence heard of his favorite young brother, that he had fought so gallantly for his country, and that the whole land was filled with his praise, he wept for joy. And such is the victory of love over nature, that though fast sinking under the fever and cough of a consumption in its extreme stage, he did not seem to mind it, but spent his last moments in fondly talking of his brother George, who, he said, "he had always believed would one day or other be a great man!"

On opening his will, it was found that George had lost nothing by his dutiful and affectionate behaviour to his brother Lawrence. For having now no issue (his only child, a little daughter, lately dying) he left to George all his rich lands in Berkley, together with his great estate on the Potomac, called MOUNT VERNON, in honour of old Admiral Vernon, by whom he had been treated with great politeness, while a volunteer with him at the unfortunate siege of Carthagera, in 1741. . . .

Happily for America, George Washington was not born with "a silver spoon in his mouth." The Rappahannock plantation left him by his father, was only in reversion—and his mother was still in her prime. Seeing then no chance of ever rising in the world but by his own merit, on leaving school he went up to Fairfax to see his brother Lawrence, with whom he found Mr. William Fairfax, one of the governor's council, who was come up on a visit to his sister, whom Lawrence had married. The counsellor presently took a great liking to George; and hearing him express a wish to get employment as a surveyor, introduced him to his relative, Lord Fairfax, the wealthy proprietor of all those lands generally called the Northern Neck, lying between the Potomac and Rappahannock, and extending from Smith's Point, on the Chesapeake, to the foot of the great Allegheny. At the instance of the counsellor, Lord Fairfax readily engaged George as a surveyor; and sent him up into the back-woods to work. He continued in his lordship's service till his 20th year, closely pursuing the laborious life of a woodsman.

From the manner in which Washington chose to amuse his leisure hours during this period, I am almost inclined to think that he had a presentiment of the great labours that lay before him. When in Frederick, which at that time was very large, containing the counties now called Berkley, Jefferson, and Shenandoah, he boarded in the house of the widow Stevenson, generally pronounced Stinson. This lady had seven sons—William and Valentine Crawford, by her first husband; and John, and Hugh, and Dick, and Jim, and Mark Stinson, by her last husband. These seven young men, in Herculean size and strength, were equal, perhaps, to any seven sons of any other mother in Christendom. This was a family exactly to George's mind, because promising him an abundance of that manly exercise in which he delighted. In front of the house lay a fine extended green, with a square of several hundred yards. Here it was every evening, when his daily toils of surveying were ended, that George, like a young Greek training for the Olympic games, used to turn out with his sturdy young companions, "to see," as they termed it, "which was the best man," at running, jumping, and wrestling. And so keen was their passion for these sports, and so great their ambition to excel each other, that they would often persist, especially on moon-shining nights, till bed-time. The Crawfords and Stinsons, though not taller than George, were much heavier men; so that at wrestling, and particularly at the close or Indian hug, he seldom gained much matter of triumph. But in all trials of agility, they stood no chance with him!

From these Frederick county gymnastics or exercises there followed an effect which shews the very wide difference between participating in innocent and guilty pleasures. While companions in raking and gambling, heartily despise and hate one another, and when they meet in the streets, pass each other with looks as cold and shy as sheep-thieving curs—these virtuous young men, by spending their evenings together, in innocent and manly exercises, contracted a friendship which lasted for life. When George, twenty-five years after this, was called to lead the American armies, he did not forget his old friends, the Stinsons and Crawfords; but gave commissions to all of them who chose to join his army; which several of them did. William Crawford, the eldest of them, and as brave a man as ever shouldered a musket, was advanced as high as the rank of colonel, when he was burnt to death by the Indians at Sandusky. And equally cordial was the love of these young men towards George, of whom they always spoke as of a brother. Indeed, Hugh Stinson, the second brother, who had a way of snapping his eyes when he talked of anything that greatly pleased him, used to brighten up at the name of Washington; and would tell his friends, that, "he and his brother John had often laid the conqueror of England on his back;" but at the same time, would agree, that, "in running and jumping they were no match for him."

Such was the way in which George spent his leisure hours in the service of Lord Fairfax. Little did the old gentleman expect that he was educating a youth, who should one day dismember the British empire and break his own heart—which truly came to pass. For on hearing that Washington had captured Cornwallis and all his army, he called out to his black waiter, "Come, Joe! carry me to my bed! for I'm sure 'tis high time for me to die!"

BEN FRANKLIN'S SENSE OF HUMOR

From 'The Life of Benjamin Franklin.'

BEN was naturally comic in a high degree, and this pleasant vein, greatly improved by his present golden prospects, betrayed him into many a frolic with Keimer, to whom he had prudently attached himself as a journeyman, until the Annis should sail. The reader will excuse Ben for these frolics when he comes to learn what were their aims; as also what an insufferable old creature this Keimer was. Silly as a booby, yet vain as a jay, and garrulous as a pie, he could never rest but when in a stiff argument, and acting the orator, at which he looked on Cicero himself as but a boy to him. Here was a fine target for Ben's Socratic artillery, which he frequently played off on the old pomposo with great effect. By questions artfully put, he would obtain of him certain points, which Keimer readily granted, as seeing in them no sort of connection with the matter in debate. But yet these points when granted, like distant nets slyly hauling round a porpoise or sturgeon, would, by degrees, so completely circumvent the silly fish, that with all his flouncing and fury he could never extricate himself, but rather got more deeply entangled. Often caught in this way, he became at last so afraid of Ben's questions, that he would turn as mad when one of them was "poked at him," as a bull at sight of a scarlet cloak; and would not answer the simplest question without first asking, "Well, and what would you make of that?" He came at length to form so exalted an opinion of Ben's talents for refutation, that he seriously proposed to him one day that they should turn out together and preach up a new religion! Keimer was to preach and make the converts, and Ben to answer and put to silence the gainsayers. He said a world of money might be made by it.

On hearing the outlines of this new religion, Ben found great fault with it. This he did only that he might have another frolic with Keimer; but his frolics were praiseworthy, for they all "leaned to virtue's side." The truth is, he saw that Keimer was prodigiously a hypocrite. At every whipstitch he could play the knave, and then for a pretence would read his Bible. But it was not the moral part of the Bible, the sweet precepts and parables of the Gospel that he read. No, verily. Food so angelic was not at all to the tooth of his childish fancy, which delighted in nothing but the novel and curious. Like too many of the saints nowadays, he would rather read about the witch of Endor, than the good Samaritan, and hear a sermon on the brazen candlesticks than on the love of God. And then, oh dear! who was Melchizedeck? Or where was the land of Nod? Or, was it in the shape of a serpent or a monkey that the devil tempted Eve? As he was one day poring over the Pentateuch as busy after some nice game of this sort as a terrier on the track of a weazel, he came to that famous text where Moses says, "Thou shalt not mar the corners of thy beard." Ay! this was the divinity for Keimer. It struck him like a new light from the clouds: then rolling his eyes as from an apparition, he exclaimed, "Miserable man that I am! and was I indeed forbidden to mar even the corners of my beard, and have I been all this time shaving myself as smooth as an eunuch! Fire and brimstone, how have you been boiling up for me, and I knew it not! Hell, deepest hell is my portion, that's a clear case, unless I reform. And reform I will if I live. Yes, my poor naked chin, if ever I but get another crop upon thee and I suffer it to be touched by the ungodly steel, then let my right hand forget her cunning."

From that day he became as shy of a razor as ever Samson was. His long black whiskers "whistled in the wind." And then to see how he would stand up before his glass and stroke them down, it would have reminded you of some ancient Druid, adjusting the sacred mistletoe.

Ben could not bear that sight. Such shameless neglect of angel morality, and yet such fidgetting about a goatish beard! "Heavens, sir," said he to Keimer, one day in the midst of a hot argument,

Who can think, with common sense,
A smooth-shaved face gives God offence?
Or that a whisker hath a charm,
Eternal justice to disarm?

He even proposed to him to get shaved. Keimer swore outright that he would never lose his beard. A stiff altercation ensued. But Keimer getting angry, Ben agreed at last to give up the beard. He said that, "as the beard at best was but an external, a mere excrescence, he would not insist on that as so very essential. But certainly, sir," continued he, "there is one thing that is."

Keimer wanted to know what that was.

"Why, sir," added Ben, "this turning and preaching up a new religion, is, without doubt, a very serious affair, and ought not to be undertaken too hastily. Much time, sir, in my opinion at least, should be spent in making preparation, in which fasting should certainly have a large share."

Keimer, who was a great glutton, said he could never fast.

Ben then insisted that if they were not to fast altogether, they ought, at any rate, to abstain from animal food, and live as the saints of old did, on vegetables and water.

Keimer shook his head, and said that if he were to live on vegetables and water, he should soon die.

Ben assured him that it was entirely a mistake. He had tried it often, he said, and could testify from his own experience that he was never more healthy and cheerful than when he lived on vegetables alone. "Die from feeding on vegetables, indeed! Why, sir, it contradicts reason; and contradicts all history, ancient and profane. There was Daniel, and his three young friends, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who fed on a vegetable diet, of choice; did they languish and die of it? Or rather, did they not display a rouge of health and fire of genius, far beyond those silly youths who crammed on all the luxuries of the royal table? And that amiable Italian nobleman, Lewis Cornaro, who says of bread, that it was such a dainty to his palate, that he was almost afraid, at times, it was too good for him to eat; did he languish and die of this simple fare? On the contrary, did he not outlive three generations of gratified epicures; and after all, go off in his second century, like a bird of Paradise, singing the praises of temperance and virtue? And pray, sir," continued Ben, "where's the wonder of all this? Must not the blood that is formed of vegetables be the purest in nature? And then, as the spirits depend on the blood, must not the spirits secreted from such blood be the purest too? And when this is the case with the blood and spirits, which are the very life of the man, must not that man enjoy the best chance for such healthy secretions and circulations as are most conducive to long and happy life?"

While Ben argued at this rate, Keimer regarded him with a look which seemed to say, "Very true, sir; all this is very true; but still I cannot go it."

Ben, still unwilling to give up his point, thought he would make one more push at him. "What a pity it is," said he, with a sigh, "that the blessings of so sublime a religion should be all lost to the world, merely for lack of a little fortitude on the part of its propagators."

This was touching him on the right string; for Keimer was a man of such vanity, that a little flattery would put him up to anything. So after a few hems and ha's, he said, he believed he would, at any rate, make a trial of this new regimen.

Having thus carried his point, Ben immediately engaged a poor old woman of the neighborhood to become their cook; and gave her offhand, written receipts for three-and-forty dishes; not one of which contained a single atom of fish, flesh, or fowl. For their first day's breakfast on the new regimen, the old woman treated them with a tureen of oatmeal gruel. Keimer was particularly fond of his breakfast, at which a nice beef-steak with onion sauce was a standing dish. It was as good as a farce to Ben, to see with what an eye Keimer regarded the tureen, when entering the room, in place of his steak, hot, smoking, and savory, he beheld this pale, meagre-looking slop.

"What have you got there?" said he, with a visage grim, and scowling eye.

"A dish of hasty-pudding," replied Ben, with the smile of an innocent youth who had a keen appetite, with something good to satisfy it—"a dish of nice hasty-pudding, sir, made of oats."

"Of oats!" retorted Keimer, with a voice raised to a scream.

"Yes, sir, oats," rejoined Ben—"oats, that precious grain which gives such elegance and fire to our noblest of quadrupeds, the horse."

Keimer growled out that he was no horse to eat oats.

"No matter for that," replied Ben, "'tis equally good for men."

Keimer denied that any human being ever eat oats.

"Ay!" said Ben, "and pray what's become of the Scotch? Don't they live on oats; and yet where will you find a people so 'bonny, blythe, and gay;' a nation of such wits and warriors?"

As there was no answering this, Keimer sat down to the tureen, and swallowed a few spoonfuls, but not without making as many wry faces as if it had been so much jalap; while Ben, all smile and chat, breakfasted most deliciously.

At dinner, by Ben's order, the old woman paraded a trencher piled up with potatoes. Keimer's grumbling fit came on him again. "He saw clear enough," he said, "that he was to be poisoned."

"Pooh, cheer up, man," replied Ben; "this is your right preacher's bread."

"Bread the d—l!" replied Keimer, snarling.

"Yes, bread, sir," continued Ben, pleasantly; "the bread of life, sir; for where do you find such health and spirits, such bloom and beauty, as among the honest-hearted Irish, and yet for their breakfast, dinner, and supper, the potato is their teetotum; the first, second, and third course." In this way, Ben and his old woman went on with Keimer; daily ringing the changes on oatmeal gruel, roasted potatoes, boiled rice, and so on, through the whole family of roots and grains in all their various genders, moods, and tenses.

Sometimes, like a restive mule, Keimer would kick up and show strong symptoms of flying the way. But then Ben would prick him up again with a touch of his ruling passion, vanity; "only think, Mr. Keimer," he would say, "only think what has been done by the founders of new religions: how they have enlightened the ignorant, polished the rude, civilized the savage, and made heroes of those who were little better than brutes. Think, sir, what Moses did among the stiff-necked Jews; what Mahomet did among the wild Arabs—and what you may do among these gentle drab-coated Pennsylvanians.” This, like a spur in the flank of a jaded horse, gave Keimer a new start, and pushed him on afresh to his gruel breakfasts and potato dinners. Ben strove hard to keep him up to this gait. Often at table, and especially when he saw that Keimer was in good-humor and fed kindly, he would give a loose to fancy, and paint the advantages of their new regimen in the most glowing colors. “Ay, sir,” he would say, letting drop at the same time his spoon, as in an ecstasy of his subject, while his pudding on the platter cooled—“ay, sir, now we are beginning to live like men going a-preaching indeed. Let your epicures gormandize their fowl, fish, and flesh, with draughts of intoxicating liquors. Such gross, inflammatory food may suit the brutal votaries of Mars and Venus. But our views, sir, are different altogether; we are going to teach wisdom and benevolence to mankind. This is a heavenly work, sir, and our minds ought to be heavenly. Now, as the mind depends greatly on the body, and the body on the food, we should certainly select that which is of the most pure and refining quality. And this, sir, is exactly the food to our purpose. This mild potato, or this gentle pudding, is the thing to insure the light stomach, the cool liver, the clear head, and, above all, those celestial passions which become a preacher that would moralize the world. And these celestial passions, sir, let me add, though I don’t pretend to be a prophet, these celestial passions, sir, were you but to stick to this diet, would soon shine out in your countenance with such apostolic majesty and grace, as would strike all beholders with reverence, and enable you to carry the world before you.”

Such was the style of Ben’s rhetoric with old Keimer. But it could not all do. For though these harangues would sometimes make him fancy himself as big as Zoroaster or Confucius, and talk as if he should soon have the whole country running after him, and worshipping him for the Great Lama of the West; yet this divinity fit was too much against the grain to last long. Unfortunately for poor Keimer, the kitchen lay between him and his bishopric: and both nature and habit had so wedded him to that swinish idol, that nothing could divorce him. So, after having been led by Ben a "very d—l of a life," as he called it, "for three months," his flesh-pot appetites prevailed, and he swore, "by his whiskers, he would suffer it no longer." Accordingly, he ordered a nice roast pig for dinner, and desired Ben to invite a young friend to dine with them. Ben did so: but neither himself nor his young friend were anything the better for the pig. For before they could arrive, the pig being done, and his appetite beyond all restraint, Keimer had fallen on it and devoured the whole. And there he sat panting and torpid as an anaconda who had just swallowed a young buffalo. But still his looks gave sign that the "ministers of grace" had not entirely deserted him, for at sight of Ben and his young friend, he blushed up to the eyelids, and in a glow of scarlet, which showed that he paid dear for his whistle (gluttony), he apologized for disappointing them of their dinner. "Indeed, the smell of the pig," he said, "was so sweet, and the nicely browned skin so inviting, especially to him who had been long starved, that for the soul of him he could not resist the temptation to taste it—and then, oh! if Lucifer himself had been at the door, he must have gone on, let what would have been the consequences." He said, too, "that for his part he was glad it was a pig and not a hog, for that he verily believed he should have bursted himself." Then leaning back in his chair and pressing his swollen abdomen with his paws, he exclaimed, with an awkward laugh, "Well, I don't believe I was ever cut out for a bishop!" Here ended the farce; for Keimer never after this uttered another word about his new religion.

AMELIA B. WELBY

WELDON T. MYERS

THERE is one poem by Mrs. Amelia B. Welby—perhaps her very best—that lives in the memory of thousands of the present generation, though the name of the author be utterly forgotten. It was the good fortune of the “Rainbow” to inherit a place, with a mere mention of the author, in Holmes’s ‘Fifth Reader,’ one of that series of school books so prominent in the South during the last quarter of the Nineteenth Century. Boys and girls of twenty and thirty years ago, students of Holmes’s old ‘Fifth Reader,’ all admired and loved the beautiful “Rainbow,” and even now, as men and women, they fondly repeat the lines:

“I sometimes have thoughts, in my loneliest hours,
That lie on my heart like the dew on the flowers,
Of a ramble I took one bright afternoon
When my heart was as light as a blossom in June”—

thinking of the poem, not as the production of Mrs. Welby, but simply as a bright page in the old reader.

Amelia B. Coppuck was born in 1819 at the little town of St. Michaels, Maryland, but before she was old enough to receive any lasting impressions of her birthplace her parents moved to Baltimore. She lived her girlhood in or near this city up to her fifteenth year. In 1834 the family “went West”—to Kentucky—and took up residence, first in Lexington and later in Louisville. In this latter city Amelia’s brief, quiet life was spent. Four years after leaving her native Maryland, and when only nineteen, she was married to Mr. George Welby, a merchant of Louisville. She died in 1852, the mother of one child, a son, born two months before her death.

The Minstrel-girl, for this she once called herself, began at the age of eighteen to write poetry for the Louisville Journal over the signature of “Amelia,” and kept up her contributions pretty regularly for ten years. Copied from paper to paper, her fugitive poems caught the fancy of the people of what was then known as the “West,” and before long the great reviewers of the East thought her talent worthy of their respect. George D. Prentice, R. W. Griswold, and Edgar Allan Poe were among the critics who praised the light melody and varied fancy of “Amelia,” and pointed out her lack of discipline and lack of originality. In 1845 a small octavo volume of her poems, published in Boston, proved so popular that the Appletons of New York sought and obtained the right of publication, bringing out fifteen editions within the next fifteen years.

What is the secret of this fact, that the envied popularity of fifty years ago has by this time drifted so far toward indifference and neglect? Passing by the social and economic conditions affecting Southern literature since 1860, let us see in what measure the poems of "Amelia" carry in themselves the explanation of their fate.

A young girl with eager, sensitive soul, watched over in a pure home and led in the ways of quiet religious devotion, begins to think on the wonderful life without and within herself. The Chesapeake Bay stretches before her with its moods of storm and calm; above her is the sky, varying day and night, its blue dome broken with clouds or lighted with stars; around her are the dear companions of her own age, hand in hand with whom she goes along the sea under the sky at twilight. The friends converse together on the objects above and about them and, somehow, Amelia, now just on the verge of womanhood, though unguided and untaught, begins to put her thoughts in simple verse. Suddenly from the midst of these happy realities she is taken away to a strange and distant country. The present has in a moment become her past; the familiar earth, sea, sky, and friends are transferred from the actual to the ideal; experience is lost in memory.

However happy and complete with novel interest her life was in Kentucky, henceforth her poetic mood was chiefly that of reminiscence. The poems which, at the age of eighteen, she began to give to the public sang not so much of the passionate present or the golden future as of the dear, regretted past; of sea and sky and friends rising in memory at twilight hours. Half of her poems are in this vein. Many times, contrary to the spirit of her theme, she yields to the allurements of her tender melancholy. Certainly, one thinks, "Summer Birds" would furnish matter for the morning or noontide, but after a few cheery verses we are brought "beneath the moon's pale ray" and "among the tombs." For the bird-songs call back the "loved of other years," and

"Often, when the mournful night
Comes with a low sweet tune,
And sets a star on every height
And one beside the moon,
When not a sound of wind or wave
The holy stillness mars,
I look above and strive to trace
Their dwellings in the stars."

Here, as in so many of her poems, are sea, sky, and loved ones coming out of the past. The Goddess of Memory is her favorite muse—Mnemosyne.

Her prevailing mood being reminiscent, sadness and melancholy attend. She loves the twilight and moonlight, and often speaks of death. Many of her brightest effusions end with a sigh. And with all this, very consistently, there is a mingling of a sweet religious hope and faith. We might look in vain for a trace of wit, or humor. We find at most true womanly sentiment or bright, delicate fancies, uttered in fluent, melodious rhythm through line after line and stanza after stanza.

This tone of quiet personal confidence, revealing the melancholy of a gentle heart that muses much on a happy past, charmed the public to "Amelia's" song. The critics, too, acknowledged her gift, and commended it all the more because on looking closely they discerned signs of greater promise in the young Minstrel-girl.

Had that promise been fulfilled, had Mrs. Welby widened and deepened her special gift and added to it the strength of other powers, her songs would have kept much of the popularity they first won. But when she essayed to enter the domain of thought and imagination, monotony and dulness took the place of sweet memories and fancies. Her one narrow field having been gleaned over and over, she could find no new room for exercise. Her theme, but not her energy, had been exhausted. Conscious of this state, she became sad at heart, and her cry was:

"O! in my soul too wild and strong
This gift has grown,
Bright spirit of immortal song
Take back thine own!"

The last four years of her life were lived in silence.

Though shut out from the realms of thought, imagination and deep feeling, Mrs. Welby, with her genuine and varied womanly fancy and sentiment, might have attained high rank among the lyric poets, if her powers from the first had been steadily disciplined. But she was unschooled, unguided in her art, as she herself confessed:

" 'Tis with an untaught hand I sweep the chords."

Left, therefore, to her own ready, unrestrained utterance, she repeats herself not only from one poem to another, but not infrequently from stanza to stanza. Again, she has no skill at condensation, and nearly all her pieces show twice too many words for the matter they contain. The early critics warned her against repetition and diffuseness, but for some reason or other she never obeyed them.

Light, varied fancy, tender sentiment, a persistent note of pathos, a prompt and facile rhythm—these are the qualities that won for “Amelia” at the beginning a generous welcome. On the other hand, her narrow range of experience with the tendency to self-repetition, the lack of literary discipline with the tendency to diffuseness—these made against her fame in the long run. From the seventy-four pieces included in the fullest edition of her poetry, a varied selection can be made, and her merits so illustrated as to afford the present generation much of the pleasure that her poems gave to readers of fifty and sixty years ago.

THE RAINBOW

All poems copyrighted by D. Appleton and Company, and used here by permission of the publishers.

I sometimes have thoughts, in my loneliest hours,
That lie on my heart like the dew on the flowers,
Of a ramble I took one bright afternoon
When my heart was as light as a blossom in June;
The green earth was moist with the late fallen showers,
The breeze fluttered down and blew open the flowers,
While a single white cloud, to its haven of rest
On the white wing of peace, floated off in the west.

As I threw back my tresses to catch the cool breeze,
That scattered the rain-drops and dimpled the seas,
Far up the blue sky a fair rainbow unrolled
Its soft-tinted pinions of purple and gold.
'Twas born in a moment, yet quick as its birth,
It had stretched to the uttermost ends of the earth,
And, fair as an angel, it floated as free,
With a wing on the earth and a wing on the sea.

How calm was the ocean! how gentle its swell!
 Like a woman's soft bosom it rose and it fell;
 While its light sparkling waves, stealing laughingly o'er,
 When they saw the fair rainbow, knelt down on the shore.
 No sweet hymn ascended, no murmur of prayer,
 Yet I felt that the spirit of worship was there,
 And bent my young head, in devotion and love,
 'Neath the form of the angel that floated above.

How wide was the sweep of its beautiful wings!
 How boundless its circle! how radiant its rings!
 If I looked on the sky, 'twas suspended in air;
 If I looked on the ocean, the rainbow was there;
 Thus forming a girdle, as brilliant and whole
 As the thoughts of the rainbow, that circled my soul.
 Like the wing of the Deity, calmly unfurled,
 It bent from the cloud and encircled the world.

There are moments, I think, when the spirit receives
 Whole volumes of thought on its unwritten leaves,
 When the folds of the heart in a moment uncloset
 Like the innermost leaves from the heart of a rose.
 And thus, when the rainbow had passed from the sky,
 The thoughts it awoke were too deep to pass by;
 It left my full soul, like the wing of a dove,
 All fluttering with pleasure, and fluttering with love.

I know that each moment of rapture or pain
 But shortens the links in life's mystical chain;
 I know that my form, like that bow from the wave,
 Must pass from the earth, and lie cold in the grave;
 Yet O! When death's shadows my bosom encloud,
 When I shrink at the thought of the coffin and shroud,
 May Hope, like the rainbow, my spirit enfold
 In her beautiful pinions of purple and gold.

THE GREEN MOSSY BANKS WHERE THE BUTTERCUPS GREW

O, my thoughts are away where my infancy flew,
Near the green mossy bank where the buttercups grew,
Where the bright silver fountain eternally played,
First laughing in sunshine, then singing in shade;
There oft in my childhood I've wandered in play,
Flinging up the cool drops of the light falling spray,
Till my small naked feet were all bathed in bright dew
As I played on the bank where the buttercups grew.

How softly that green bank sloped down from the hill
To the spot where the fountain grew suddenly still!
How cool was the shadow the long branches gave,
As they hung from the willow and dipped in the wave;
And then each pale lily, that slept on the stream,
Rose and fell with the wave, as if stirred by a dream!
While my home 'mid the vine-leaves rose soft on my view,
As I played on the bank where the buttercups grew.

The beautiful things! how I watched them unfold,
Till they lifted their delicate vases of gold!
O, never a spot since those days have I seen
With leaves of such freshness and flowers of such sheen!
How glad was my spirit for then there was naught
To burden its wing, save some beautiful thought
Breaking up from its depths with each wild wind that blew
O'er the green mossy bank where the buttercups grew.

The paths I have trod I would quickly retrace,
Could I win back the gladness that looked from my face
As I cooled my warm lip in that fountain I love
With a spirit as pure as the wing of a dove—
Could I wander again where my forehead was starred
With the beauty that dwelt in my bosom unmarred,
And, calm as a child in the starlight and dew,
Fall asleep on the bank where the buttercups grew.

THE CAPTIVE SAILOR BOY

The light of many stars
Quivers in tremulous softness on the air,
And the night-breeze is singing here and there,
Yet from my prison-bars
A narrow strip of sky is all I see—
O! that some kindly hand would set me free!

The bright new moon is hung
Up 'mid the softness of the fleecy clouds,
And the far ocean 'neath its foamy shrouds
Thrills like a harp fresh strung,
And the wild sea-birds on quick pinions flee—
O! for one glance upon the deep blue sea!

Why should the young and brave
Be fettered thus upon the fresh green earth?
Give me one hour beside my mother's hearth,
And then for ocean's wave!
Free as the laughing billows I would toss—
O! for the swift wing of the albatross!

When slumber waves her wand
Over my brow, I wander in my dreams
Close by the ripples of our soft blue streams
Far in my native land,
And lovely visions o'er my eyelids play—
O! that I could but dream my life away!

I see my mother then;
A pleasant smile sleeps on her features fair,
And the low cadence of her whispered prayer
Steals on my ear again,
As when I knelt beside her blessed knee—
Mother, sweet Mother, dost thou pray for me?

Upon the summer rose
Nature's faint pencilings are softly seen,
Laid on with cunning hand, and bright and green,

Where the wood-branches close
The honey-suckle wreathes our cottage eaves—
Alas! I may not sit beneath its leaves!

Before I sought the sea,
I used to wander with my sister sweet,
And many a winding path our little feet
Made round the old oak tree,
Where in the sunshine we were wont to play—
And they are there—but I am far away!

O! could I only ride
Upon the ocean where the wild winds meet,
And where the sea-shell singeth passing sweet
Under the trembling tide,
The demon of the storms I would not fear—
But O! I am a fettered captive here!

O! could I see my home
If but to kiss my sister's cheek once more,
And hear thee, Mother, bless me o'er and o'er!
For then not e'en my doom
Could dim thy truant's laughter-loving eye—
Alas! without thy blessing I must die!

Die in this dreary cell,
With no fond ear to catch my parting breath,
In bondage I must wrestle here with death,
Without one sweet farewell
From lips that oft have smiled on me in joy—
Alas! sweet Mother, for thy captive boy!

TO A HUMMING-BIRD

A merry welcome to thee, glittering bird!
Lover of summer flowers and sunny things!
A night hath passed since my young buds have heard
The music of thy rainbow-colored wings—
Wings, that flash sparkles out where'er they quiver,
Like sudden sunlight rushing o'er a river.

A merry welcome and a treat for thee!
Here are fresh blossoms opening bright and new,
Ready to yield thee, for thy melody,
Their first rich sighs and drops of honey-dew,
Opening their blushing petals to the glances
Of silvery sheen, that round thy light form dances.

Methinks thou'rt early out—the queenly night
Her star-gemmed curtain scarce has folded back;
And now the glorious sun, a monarch bright,
Bursts forth into his gold-pavilioned track,
Kissing from dew-bent flowers the tears of even,
And scattering her bright mists from earth and heaven.

How fair is all around! and thou, bright thing,
Though but a speck, a brilliant one thou art;
I almost think the humming of thy wing
Must be the merry echoes of thy heart;
For what if other birds have happier voices?
Thou need'st not care—thy very wing rejoices.

Child of the sunshine! bird of summer hours!
Brief is thy life, yet happy as 'tis brief,
For thou wilt pass away when bloom-touched flowers
Are fading from the green earth, leaf by leaf;
I envy thee, for when the things we cherish
Are withering round, 'tis meet with them to perish.

Here thou mayst banquet till the first faint gleams
Of twilight wander o'er the face of day, wooing our spirits to the land of dreams;

There on a sunbeam thou wilt flit away;
But, at the earliest dawn of morning's hour,
I'll welcome thee again unto my bower.

THE VIOLET'S SONG TO THE LOST FAIRY

Come to me, fairy queen,
Stars o'er thee, lightly
Floating in dazzling sheen
Glimmer out brightly;
Moonbeams are glittering
On each pure blossom—
Fold up thy weary wing,
Come to my bosom.

Sleep like a dewy cloud,
On thy brow presses;
Round thy form, like a shroud,
Droop thy fair tresses:
Heavy thine eyelids close
O'er thy glance shaded;
I'll give thee soft repose,
Thou lost and faded.

Each lily's pearly cup
Sheds out pale gleamings;
Roses are folded up
To their sweet dreamings;
Hark! how the night-winds pass,
Mournfully sighing,
Through the down-trailing grass—
Where art thou flying?

Where the young willow boughs
Greenly are waving,
Where the blue streamlet flows
Sunny banks laving,
There sit thy fairy few,
Their glances veiling
'Neath tears that fall like dew,
Thy loss bewailing.

I've oped my azure bell
 Wide to receive thee,
 Where if thou'lt ever dwell
 None may deceive thee;
 I'll breath my faint perfume
 On thy lip only—
 Love thee through joy and gloom,
 Thou fair and lonely.

WHEN SOFT STARS

When soft stars are peeping
 Through the pure azure sky
 And southern gales sweeping
 Their warm breathings by Like sweet music pealing
 Far o'er the blue sea
 There comes o'er me stealing
 Sweet memories of thee.

The bright rose when faded
 Flings forth o'er its tomb
 Its violet leaves laded
 With silent perfume:
 Thus round me will hover
 In grief, or in glee,
 Till Life's dream be over,
 Sweet memories of thee.

As a sweet lute, that lingers
 In silence alone,
 Unswept by light fingers,
 Scarce murmurs a tone,
 My young heart resembled
 That lute light and free,
 Till o'er its chords trembled,
 Those memories of thee.

THE BEREAVED

The moon within our casement beams,
Our blue-eyed babe hath dropped to sleep,
And I have left it to its dreams,
Amid the shadows deep,
To muse beside the silver tide,
Whose waves are rippling at thy side.

It is a still and lovely spot,
Where they have laid thee down to rest,
The white rose and forget-me-not
Bloom sweetly o'er thy breast,
And birds, and streams with liquid lull,
Have made the stillness beautiful.

And softly through the forest-bars
Light, lovely shapes, on glossy plumes,
Float ever in, like winged stars,
Amid the purpling glooms;
Their sweet songs, borne from tree to tree,
Thrill the light leaves with melody.

Alas! the very path I trace,
In happier hours, thy footsteps made;
This spot was once thy resting place,
Within the silent shade;
Thy white hand trained the fragrant bough
That drops its blossoms o'er me now;

'Twas here at eve we used to rove,
'Twas here I breathed my whispered vows,
And sealed them on thy lips, my love!
Beneath the apple-boughs.
Our hearts had melted into one,
But Death undid what Love had done.

Alas! too deep a weight of thought
Had filled thy heart in youth's sweet hour;
It seemed with love and bliss o'erfraught,
A fleeting passion-flower,
Unfolding 'neath a southern sky
To blossom soon, and soon to die.

Yet in those calm and blooming bowers
I seem to feel thy presence still,
Thy breath seems floating o'er the flowers,
Thy whisper on the hill;
The clear, faint starlight, and the sea,
Are whispering to my heart of thee.

No more thy smiles my heart rejoice,
Yet still I start to meet thine eye,
And call upon the low, sweet voice,
That gives me no reply—
And list within my silent door
For the light feet that come no more.

THE MOURNFUL HEART

My heart is like a lonely bird,
That sadly sings,
Brooding upon its nest unheard,
With folded wings.

For of my thoughts the sweetest part
Lie all untold,
And treasured in this mournful heart
Like precious gold.

The fever-dreams that haunt my soul
Are deep and strong;
For through its deep recesses roll
Such floods of song.

I strive to calm, to lull to rest,
Each mournful strain,
To lay the phantom in my breast—
But ah! 'tis vain.

The glory of thy silent skies,
Each kindling star,
The young leaves stirred with melodies
My quiet mar.

O! in my soul too wild and strong
This gift hath grown.
Bright spirit of immortal song!
Take back thine own.

I know no sorrows round me cling,
My years are few;
And yet my heart's the saddest thing
I ever knew.

For in my thoughts the world doth share
But little part;
A mournful thing it is to bear
A mournful heart.

THE EVENING SKIES

Soft skies! amid your halls to-night
How brightly beams each starry sphere!
Beneath your softly mellowed light
The loveliest scenes grow lovelier!
How high, how great, the glorious Power
That bade these silvery dew-drops fall;
That touched with bloom the folded flower,
And bent the blue sky over all.

I love to glide in these still hours
With heart, and thought, and fancy free,
When naught but stars, and waves, and flowers,
May give me their sweet company!
When far below the waves outspread
Glide softly on with liquid hue;
When winds are low—and skies o'erhead
Are beaming beautifully blue.

Oh, what a heavenly hour is this!
The green earth seems an Eden-home—
And yet I pine amid my bliss,
For purer blisses yet to come!
How can my spirit gaze aloft
Upon your deep delicious blue,
And float to those far realms so oft,
And never sigh to flutter through?

And yet this spot, so still, so lone,
 Seems formed to suit my mournful mood,
The far blue heavens seem all my own,
 And all this lovely solitude!
A voice seems whispering on the hill
 Soft as my own—and on the sea
A living spirit seems to thrill
 And throb with mine deliciously!

Yet, though my thoughts from care seem freed,
 And a soft joy pervades my breast,
That makes me almost feel indeed
 That hearts on earth are sometimes blessed!
There is a spell in those hushed skies—
 A something felt in this lone spot,
That makes my very soul arise
 With longing for—it knows not what!

Beneath such skies I sometimes doubt
 My heart can e'er have dreamed of sin—
The world seems all so calm without,
 And all my thoughts so pure within!
Such dreams play o'er my folded lid!
 Such heavenly visions greet my view!
I almost seem to glide amid
 The angel-bands, an angel, too!

ELIZABETH BISLAND WETMORE

[1861—]

KATHERINE VERDERY

ELIZABETH BISLAND was born in the State of Louisiana, February 11, 1861, on Fairfax Plantation. A big Palladian house with massive pillared porticoes, set amid a grove of old live-oaks, like so many of the residences of that date in the "Evangeline Country"; already famous through Longfellow's poem. It was the home of her father, Thomas Shields Bisland. He had studied medicine, but preferred the ampler, pleasanter life of the Southern sugar planter on his inherited estates to the laborious practice of his profession. His wife, Margaret Cyrilla Brownson, was a woman of marked beauty and decided literary ability, which under different circumstances might have brought her prominently into the world of letters.

Like most Americans the family combined many strains of blood. Thomas Bisland on the maternal side derived from the Huguenot Du Praslins, who early settled in South Carolina, and from Elizabeth, third daughter of John Knox, the Scotch Reformer by his second wife Lady Margaret Stuart, a cousin of Queen Mary. The Brownsons were descendants of the Asshetons, baronets of James I's creation and seated in Leicestershire from the time of the Conquest, and also from Sir Gregory Watts, Lord Mayor of London in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Ralph Assheton was a connection by marriage of William Penn and assisted him in the foundation of his colony.

Elizabeth Bisland's great-grandmother was the second wife of Don Fernando Gayoso de Lemos, the last Spanish governor of the Province of Louisiana, who because of her fondness of canary-colored dresses was known throughout the territory as "The Yellow Countess."

Hugh Bisland was hanged at the Tolbooth in Edinborough in 1715 for going out with the Pretender. The family emigrated to South Carolina, but in 1778 their land was confiscated and their house burned because of their unrelenting Toryism, and for "giving aid and comfort to the British." They again emigrated to the Province of Louisiana, and securing a grant of land from the Spaniards, settled near what is now known as Natchez, Mississippi.

Elizabeth Bisland was the second child and one of a family of nine.

Her advent being almost simultaneous with the outbreak of the Civil War, the sound of cannon and the smoke of battle formed the atmosphere of her infancy, and the bitter struggle of the reconstruction period robbed her of the irresponsible joys of childhood.

Her father entered the Confederate Army with the rank of lieutenant, but his medical education was soon pressed into service, and it was in the capacity of surgeon that he remained in the army throughout the war.

After the fall of Mobile the Federals, under the command of General Banks, ascended the Bayou Têche in force. The young mother and her two babies fled in an army ambulance through the Red River country to the old home in Natchez, and two bloody encounters took place at Fairfax. The Confederates under General "Dick" Taylor met the Union troops at this point and the fighting raged back and forth through the house itself. General Taylor in 'Destruction and Reconstruction' describes this engagement, at what he calls "Camp Bisland."

At the conclusion of the war the family returned to Louisiana to spend the bitter days of the reconstruction period. The story of hardships of this time in the South is a familiar one. Food of all kind was scarce and meat a rare luxury. Educational opportunities were almost non-existent. It was under such adverse circumstances that Elizabeth's childhood was spent.

"Big hominy" was the main staple of food for the growing little body, and a garret full of half mutilated books the only diet for a hungry mind. But the books were good. Old English classics and stately translations from the Greek and Latin poets. The fact that often the first and last pages of a volume were missing may have acted as a beneficial stimulus to the child's eager imagination, for she delighted to supply these defects to suit her own fancy.

When she was twelve years old the family inherited the ancestral place in Natchez and moved thither. It was at about this time that she began to write verse in secret. For a hiding place for her papers she used an old secret cupboard where money had been stored in the Spanish days, confiding her little manuscripts to its safe keeping during the hours when she assisted her mother in the care of the increasingly large family.

Mrs. Bisland was at this time also writing verse, much of which appeared in the New Orleans Times-Democrat, thus enabling her to add a few dollars to the wrecked fortunes of the family.

At sixteen Elizabeth made her first venture in this direction, sending a Christmas sonnet to the same paper which was, for some quaint youthful reason, now forgotten, signed B. L. R. Dane.

Overcome with the acute shyness so often attendant on the early efforts of sensitive and artistic natures, she walked miles to a neighboring village lest her own postmark betray her identity, oblivious to the fact that this close incognito prevented any remuneration reaching her.

Eagerly she watched the issues of the paper, and was rewarded by seeing the sonnet given a prominent place in the Christmas edition.

After that many verses appeared in its columns signed B. L. R. Dane, the quality of which attracted the attention of the editor to such an extent that he wrote Mrs. Bisland to ask if she knew a poet in her neighborhood by the name of Dane. This being discussed in the family circle Elizabeth shyly confessed the authorship. Both family and editor were amazed, the latter writing that he had supposed the poems written by an elderly man who had spent much time in England—for which impression the old English volumes in the garret must have been responsible.

The young authoress received back pay for all the work which had appeared, and this was her first capital.

The need of money becoming increasingly great, she soon went to New Orleans, where she was given a salaried position on the Times-Democrat. She worked incessantly writing reviews, verse, all sorts of stray articles, and practically filling the woman's department on the paper.

At first she lived in cheap lodgings in the French quarter of the city in order to send home as much of her salary as possible.

It was at this time that she met Lafcadio Hearn, young, sensitive and struggling like herself. They recognized in each other that close kinship of spirit which is the foundation of perfect friendship, and so long as he lived the relationship remained unclouded and unchanged.

In writing to her from Japan years after, Hearn gives an exquisite pen picture of her as she appeared to him at this time.

"But you ought to see my study-room. It is not very pretty—a little Japanese matted room, with glass sliding windows (upstairs), and a table and chair. . . . On the opposite wall is the shadow of a beautiful and wonderful person whom I knew long years ago in the strange city of New Orleans. (She was sixteen years old, or so, when I first met her; and I remember that not long afterwards she was dangerously ill, and that several people were afraid she would die in that quaint little hotel where she was stopping.)

"The shadows watch me while the night lasts. . . . The lady talks to me about a fire of wreckwood, that used to burn with red and blue lights. I remember that I used to sit long ago by that Rosicrucian glow, and talk to her; but I remember nothing else—only the sound of her voice—low and clear and at times like a flute.

. . . My memory is of a Voice and a Thought—multiple, both, exceedingly—but justifying the imagination of une jeune fille un peu farouche (there is no English word that gives the same sense of shyness and force) who came into New Orleans from the country, and wrote nice things for the paper there, and was so kind to a particular kind of savage that he could not understand—and was afraid."

At the end of several years' work in New Orleans, she felt her field too limited and went accordingly to New York, reaching there with a few letters of introduction and fifty dollars in her pocket, but with high courage in her heart. She went directly to Mr. Chester Lord of the Sun and asked for work. He listened patiently and then looking at her kindly he said, "My dear little girl, pack your trunk and go back home; this is no place for you."

But on being assured that such a course was out of the question he consented to give her a trial.

She brought him an account of a negro burial with vivid touches of humor and pathos, which he not only accepted, but which led to her receiving many assignments from the Sun.

Gradually she gained a firm foothold in the newspaper circles of the Great City. As soon as her finances would permit, she left the dreary atmosphere of boarding house life and took a modest little apartment. Here on Sunday afternoons the most interesting literary and artistic people of New York gathered about her tea table. Such men as Sir Henry Irving, Coquelin the elder, Edmund Clarence Stedman, Vassili Verestchagin, the painter, and Archibald Forbes, the war correspondent, came to listen to the "flute-like" voice which lived so musically in Hearn's memory. And of that "kindness" of which he also speaks there was no end.

Even when her own way was most thickly beset with difficulties she never turned a deaf ear to the perplexities of others struggling with the problem of living. She was quick with tactful advice and generous in praise of the least merit. In the battle for daily bread her fine womanliness suffered no tarnish, nor in future years of prosperity did she lose in any degree the great art of sympathy.

In 1889 she was doing work for the New York World, the New York Sun, the Illustrated American, writing the New York letter for the Brooklyn Eagle and the Chicago Tribune, and was an assistant editor of the Cosmopolitan Magazine. She worked early and late producing an average of fifty thousand words a month, and earning some five thousand dollars a year.

It was at this time that Mr. Brisben Walker of the Cosmo- politan conceived the idea of sending a representative around the world with the object of beating Phineas Fogg's record of eighty days' circumnavigation in Jules Verne's fantastic book. His choice fell on Miss Bisland.

With only a few hours' preparation she started for San Francisco on November 14, 1889. At the end of seventy-six days of hard travel she returned to New York, having outstripped "Phineas Fogg" by four days.

Her account of the trip appeared first serially in the Cosmopolitan and later in book form under the title of 'Flying Trip Around the World.'

This was her first book and brought her considerable notice.

She had won many friends on the journey, one of whom was Lady Broome, who invited Miss Bisland to spend the coming season in London as her guest. The invitation was gladly accepted, and for the first time in her life she gave herself up to care-free enjoyment. She continued to write during this time but not under the whip and spur of necessity.

Lady Broome introduced her not only to social, but also to literary London, and here she met and made friends of Herbert Spencer, Jowett, the master of Balliol, Rudyard Kipling and Rhoda Broughton. The liking between the two last was cordial and mutual, and at the end of the season Miss Bisland followed Miss Broughton to her home in Oxford and secured nearby lodgings. Here she wrote in collaboration with Miss Broughton 'A Widower Indeed,' which subsequently appeared in book form on both sides of the Atlantic. Soon after its publication—in 1890—Miss Bisland became engaged to Mr. Charles W. Wetmore, an Ohio man by birth, but at the time a resident of New York. After graduating from Harvard University he was admitted to the New York Bar, where he became a prominent and successful corporation lawyer.

He had long known Miss Bisland and followed her to Oxford, where she became engaged. She returned to New York in 1891, and was married October the sixth.

Her pen lay idle for some time after this. The luxuries of life, which she appreciated too wisely to abuse, were now hers, and she had the pleasure of expressing her own individuality in a home, which she and Mr. Wetmore built at Oyster Bay, Long Island. Into the building and development of that charming Tudor house, with its acres of cultivated orchards and gardens, she put herself, giving personal supervision to every detail until the whole became expressive of her own charm.

But the necessity for more intellectual expression, which is the imperative need of all artists, was not dead, and in 1903 she published 'A Candle of Understanding,' a novel whose scene was laid in the South during the early days after the war, the atmosphere and many of the incidents of which were recalled from the memory of her own youth.

In 1906 'The Secret Life' appeared anonymously, being a series of reflections written in diary form, delightful in style and original in thought.

In the same year appeared 'The Life and Letters of Lafcadio Hearn,' her most serious work up to this time. Her intimate knowledge of Hearn and her sympathetic understanding of his complex nature enabled her to present the real man as perhaps no one else could.

The book sold largely both in America and Europe and brought her international reputation. It also created a wider demand for Hearn's books than they had ever known. His genius was of the kind to receive slow recognition and small remuneration.

The income derived from the posthumous sale of his work gave therefore, to his widow and children a much needed increase in their income. Thus by presenting him to the public as he never could have presented himself, did his life-long friend render him the last "kindness" in her power to give.

In 1909 she wrote in collaboration with Anne Hoyt, 'Seekers in Sicily,' a charming little volume embodying some of their mutual experiences during a winter spent on that island, together with much of its history and tradition little known to the general reader.

Her latest book is a second collection of essays, entitled 'At the Sign of the Hobbyhorse.'

THE RACE AGAINST TIME

. . . "A PERFECT day," the record says . . .
More undulant fields clothed in the yellow stubble of the gathered harvest. Here and there black loam broken for winter sowing—a square of jet set in pale amber—and over all a faint, turquoise sky. . . .

That night we were in Council Bluffs, Omaha, and by chance got passage in the new fast mail-train, put on as an experiment in time across the continent, which was carrying out one sleeper and the General Manager's private car.

. . . The pace was tremendous from the start. We began to climb the Great Divide. Trees and shrubs grew rare and more rare and finally vanished altogether. . . . Great gray plains all about us; covered thinly with a withered, ashen-coloured plant, the bitter results of an unequal struggle for existence, and strangely resembling in miniature the gnarled, writhen cedars that cling to wind-scourged coasts. Settlements were few and far between. Scrawny horses picked up a scanty living in the desolate upland meadows; and an occasional yellow cur who came out and barked at us as we went by was the only other form of animal life to be seen. Once in a great while we passed a dwelling, a square cabin of gray unpainted boards, always tightly closed and the dwellers absent somewhere on business. The only distinct proof I ever saw of the human habitation of these silent, lonely homes, was a tiny pair of butternut trousers fluttering on the clothes-line near one of them. The minute American citizen who should have occupied these trousers was invisible, and I fear perhaps they were his only pair.

. . . We climbed and climbed, always at tremendous speed, and always the land growing more desolate, and wildly drear. . . . like the cursed site of some prehistoric Sodom, sown with salt. The air shone with a luminous clearness undreamable in coast countries, and at night the stars were huge and fierce—not the soft-gleaming, palpitant planets of tropic nights, but keen and scintillant as swords. There was something hideous and brutal in the doom laid upon this unhappy territory, as of a Prometheus chained on the mountain tops, its blood dried to dust in its veins, and lifting a scarred face of gray despair to the rainless sky. From time to time we crossed a feeble, trickling stream, but no verdure marked the course of waters that were bitter and fruitless as tears. During the night our way lay through the still more desolate portion of this dry region, named with simple and expressive literalness, the Bad Lands, and here, again, I saw a wonderful breaking of day. The moon, wan with the dawn, hung directly in the zenith, and on the eastern rim of the ghostly gray plain, under the quivering jewel of the morning star, burned the first vague flush of morning. Slowly a dusky amethyst light filled the sapphire bowl of the sky, quenching the stars one by one as it rose, and when the sun showed over the world's edge the cup was brimmed, and the pale moon shone faintly in its depths, like the drowned pearl of the Egyptian Queen. No eye but mine was there to see, yet in the midst of unpeopled desolation, the majestic ceremonies of the sky were fulfilled with the same slow pomp and splendour as if all the worshippers of the Sun knelt in awed wonder to see the Bridegroom come forth of his chamber.

Our speed through this part of the country was terrible. Five hours away from Ogden we were two hours and a half behind the time set for our arrival. Some three-quarters of a million hung upon our reaching there promptly, and getting the track clear for ourselves beyond, not to mention any other important considerations that could scarcely be reckoned in figures, for a great Government contract for mails would be either lost or won by morning. A certain engineer, whose name was Foley—or words to that effect—was telegraphed to meet us at the next stop. He was a gentleman of Irish extraction, who laboured under an entire absence of physical timidity, and who remarked with jovial determination, as he climbed into the cab, that he would “get us to Ogden—or Hell—on time.” Frequently, during that five hours' ride, the betting stood ten to one on the latter goal, and Hades was hot favourite. The grade at this part of the road has a descent of ninety-three feet in a mile, and the track cork-screwed through gorges and cañons, with but small margin between us and destruction. To these considerations Mr. Foley was cheerfully indifferent, and, pulling out the throttle, he let the engine have her head at the rate of sixty-five miles an hour. The train rocked like a ship at sea, and sleepers held on to their berths in terror, the more nervous actually succumbing to mal de mer. The plunge of the engine, that now and again whimpered affrightedly in the darkness, could be felt through the whole train, as one feels beneath one of the fierce play of the loins of a runaway horse. From the rear car the tracks were two lines of fire in the night. The telegraph poles reeled backwards from our course, and the land fled from under us with horrible nightmare wierdness. The officers of the train grew alarmed and ordered speed slackened, but Mr. Foley, consulting his watch, regretted with great firmness that he could not oblige them. One man rolled in an anguish of terror on the floor, and the general manager, engaged in a late game of whist, regarding the sufferer with sympathetic interest as he took the odd trick with the thirteenth trump, remarked that it was such episodes as this in American life that made us a nation of youthful gray-heads.

We arrived in Ogden on time. Mr. Foley, dismounting with alacrity from his cab, remarked that these night rides were prone to give a man cold, went in pursuit of an antidote behind a swinging Venetian door on the corner, and we saw him no more.

IN THE TRACK OF WAR

From 'A Candle of Understanding.' Copyright, Harper Brothers, 1903, and used here by permission of the author and publishers.

A SOLEMN green dusk fell upon us as we passed in among the columns and arches of the tall trees. They stood ankle-deep in water, hung with enormous tresses of gray Spanish moss and knotted in vines—a dim, immemorial silence seemed to reign. We broke in upon it rudely with our oars, beating the clear brown swamp water. Big alligators, upon our coming, slid without a sound from floating logs and submerged themselves—all but a rugged snout and two small, wicked eyes. Knots of snakes, wrapped about the sharp knees of the cypress-roots, noiselessly disentangled themselves and vanished without a ripple. Flocks of little, woolly water-cabbages dipped and lifted upon our wake and drifted out of our path. Below the surface the fringe-weeds waved languidly, bending towards our keels; and looking back when we had passed, the broken silence seemed to close in again through the long, watery aisles where the frail ghost-lilies were blooming.

The sun was on the edge of the horizon when our sweating oarsmen swung the boats out into the open bayou, between the walls of sward-grass. The level cane-fields lifted themselves on either hand. A broken wharf offered a landing place.

Mungo swept the moisture from his forehead with his forefinger.

"Dar, marster! Des look how dem Rebs en Yankees done gone muss up you-all's house!" He made a gesture towards a gaping hole torn in one corner of the long, white, wooden dwelling set up above the dampness on brick piles. A chimney had been raggedly beheaded. Windows gaped. Blinds hung on a solitary hinge and bullet holes freckled the walls.

Gaunt stumps showed the source of the barricade of logs that stretched half way across the lawn, and against this the earth from a rough trench had been thrown. A broken cannon lurched sidewise over its smashed wheel and stared up to the sky in drunken helplessness of attitude.

Within doors the ruin was more active and grotesque. Pictures drooped forward in tatters from their frames. Chairs and sofas were climbing, as if in clumsy panic, against the battered doors. Torn books huddled in crazy confusion around overturned tables. Half-way up the stairway was wedged a huge mahogany bedstead, hacked and marred.

Mother stared at this moment. She said, "Oh, William!" and, dropping her flowered green silk shawl from her shoulders, sat upon the lowest step of the stairway and wept, while father exclaimed, "My God!" under his breath.

Edith and I slept rolled up in shawls on the floor that night and agreed that the South seemed a great deal more interesting and amusing than it was at grandmamma's where we always went to bed in the regular way; but I told mother I didn't mean to say "God bless everybody" in my prayers any more, because I just wouldn't have Him blessing Yankees, and mother blew her nose again and said I might do just as I liked about it.

The memoirs mentioned that it took a long time to restore some semblance of order, and that even yet one had to sit down easily in most of the chairs, and remember about the table's lame leg, and not to move the stool that hid the burned place in the carpet. Father patched the pictures and painted over the places where they were torn, and pasted the covers back on the books, and tried to put the pages where they belonged, but my record contained a passage at this point regretting that there were two or three kings I didn't know about yet—whether they had their heads cut off, or married, or what—because so often part of the book would be gone just when it was going to tell about it, and the very nicest stories generally had the first or the last part missing, so that one either didn't know what the people had done in the beginning, or else didn't find out what happened to them in the end.

THE DÖPPELGANGER

From 'The Secret Life.' Copyright, John Lane Company, 1906, and used by permission of the author and publishers.

I SUPPOSE that everyone who has reached maturity has been aware of a sense of a dual personality—of a something within him that is a me and not a me; of opposing influences that puzzle his judgment, weaken his resolves, and warp his intention. These natures he finds engaged in an eternal conflict which sways him from the course he would instinctively follow, and draws him along lines of thought and conduct satisfying to neither side of his being, and achieving only a helpless compromise between the two.

"To be?"—"Or not to be?" contend the two at every crossing of the tangled meshes of existence, and neither disputant is ever convinced by the other's logic.

"To sleep"—says one. "Perchance to dream," replies the other coldly; and so gives pause to Hamlet's swift intentions. Which is the real man? The Hamlet whose soul lusts for sudden brute revenge, whose promptings are the instinctive play of the natural man, or that frigid censor who checks the impulses of the first speaker and chills him with cold reasons and balancings of right and wrong, so that the sword falls from his nerveless hand at the very moment of opportunity? Or, after all, is the real man the one whose actions are a continual endeavour to steer between the two promptings; the Hamlet whose doings are not in direct answer to either voice—are but furious and confused outbursts of indecision?

If it were at all possible to decide between the two, one would incline to think that the second voice, that chilling critic, was another self, alien to us, though entrenched in the very depths of the soul—was the not me, in everlasting opposition to the me—was the past warring with the present.

The warm, impulsive, blundering me we know, but who is that other? Whence comes this double, this alter ego, this bosom's lord, and strange, nameless ghost who haunts the house of life? How many thousand deaths have we died to give him life? For he is inexpressibly aged, infinitely sophisticated; and while the me still crowns its locks with youth's golden illusions, he is grey with knowledge and hoary with disenchantment. Though a part of our most intimate selves, he is not at one with us. He sympathizes with none of our enthusiasms, is tempted by none of our sins. . . . Sins! . . . what should he do eating forbidden fruit who is all compounded of the knowledge of good and evil?

"Ye shall be as gods, having eaten of that tree"—and like a god he sits in the dusk of the soul's seat, knowing the past, predicting the future of our destiny. And yet is his grim wisdom of no avail, since—a shadowy Cassandra—he warns in vain. His deity-ship is of no more worth than that of the Olympian heavens, which might punish or reward, but could not divert the decrees of a power higher than itself. It is indeed the fate of all gods to have their creations caught from between their shaping hands by the blind, fumbling fingers with the shears. Gods may teach; may command; may ban or bless; but the being once made is Fate's creature, not theirs.

This cynical, impotent döppelgänger goes by many names. His Christian cognomen is Conscience, and his voice is raised to exalt Christian tenets of clean living and high thinking.

"Thou shalt surely die," he declaims from the altar where he wears with cheerful indifference the livery of a faith in which he has no part, and we walk contentedly in the path he designates, flattering ourselves upon being upheld and guided by the voice of omnipotent truth, until passion trips our heels with some hidden snare, and, rolling headlong in the mire, we lift our stained faces in astonishment to behold that calm-lidded countenance all unstirred by our wild mishap. He foresaw, but he was helpless to prevent, nor does he greatly care, since he also knows that age after age every reincarnation of the spirit must be tempted anew by the ever-renewed, ever-lustful, unalterable flesh.

Weissman diverts himself and indulges the Teutonic weakness for word-building by naming this double self the "germ-plasm"—that immortal, eternal seed of life that links the generations in an unbroken chain; changing and developing only through the unreckonable processes of time, and taking heed not at all of the mere passing accidents of fleeting avatars.

Why should not this germ-plasm, this eternal ghost, be infinitely sophisticated? What surprises can its mere momentary envelope contrive for a consciousness as old as the moon? If temptations seduce the young flesh, though the old, old soul declares with scorn that teeth are set on edge by the eating of sour grapes, it is not surprised at all when the body persists in its will to seize upon the fruit of its desire, having seen in everyone of a myriad generations the same obstinacy and weakness of the flesh, which learns little and very hardly from the spirit.

Now and again—in his moments of exalted seriousness—man listens to this ancient voice of the spirit breathing the accumulated experience of time, and then it imposes upon him the ripened wisdom of its long retrospect of the generations, and man creates religions—by which he does not square his conduct—or philosophies—whose bit he immediately takes between his teeth. But for the most part he stops his ears to the soul's stern, sad preaching with the thick wax of sentimentalism, and that undying determination that life shall not be what it is, but what he wishes it to be—and so stumbles along, through ever-renewed pangs and tragedies, after a mirage in the hard desert of existence, to whose stones and flints, despite his bruises, he will not turn his eyes. And well it is for us that upon many the mantle of flesh lies so warm and thick that this ghost called consciousness of self cannot chill their blood with his dank wisdom breathed from out a world of graves. In the hearts of such as these all the sweet illusions of existence came to full and natural bloom. To their lusty egoism life has all the exhilaration and freshness of a new and special creation.

Far otherwise is it with the haunted man, whose dwelling is blighted by that cold presence with its terrible memory. Forever echoes through his chambers the cry that hope will be unfulfilled, that love will die, the morning fade, that what has been will be again and forever again; that the waters of life will climb the shore only to crawl back again into the blind depths of eternity; that the unit is forever lost in the eternal ebb and flux of matter. Endeavour can find no footing in this profundity of experience. To all desire, all aspiration, the ghost says in a paralyzing whisper:

"Scipio, remember that thou art a man—that everything has been done even if thou doest it not—that everything will be done whether thou doest it or no. . . . Where are the poems that were written in Baalbec? Where the pictures that were painted in Tadmor of the Wilderness? Are there fewer pictures and poems to-day because the men who made them are not? Who was prime minister to the bearded King of Babylon? Where is his fame? . . . Ay, drink this cup if you will, but you know well the taste of it is not good at the bottom. You have drunk it a thousand thousand of times, and the taste was never good, and yet you will drink it a thousand times again, hoping always that it will be good."

And the haunted man sits with idle hands and withered purpose, listening always to the voice, while his neighbours push loudly on to die futilely but gloriously in the unending battle.

"An end-of-the-century disease," say those full-fed, happy egotists with lowered breath and eyes askance as they pass the haunted house. "The mould of age has fallen upon him and made him mad." Yet before the walls of Troy these two—the ghost-ridden, and the happy egotist—battled for the glowing shadow of a woman whom neither man loved nor desired. Achilles, blackly melancholy in his tent, hears the old voice cry "'Εν δέ ἰῆ τιμῇ ἡμὲν κακὸς ἡδὲ καὶ ἐσθλός." and disdains the greatness of life and the littleness of it. To the iron inevitableness of fate he opposes only indifference and an unbending courage. That which has been will be, and the end is death and darkness. He has no illusions. He wars neither for love of country nor love of Helen. If Troy falls, nothing is gained. If the Greeks fail, nothing will be lost. In time all the sweat and blood shed upon Ilium's windy plain will evaporate into a mere mist of uncredited legend. In Achilles, the other self, the alter ego, is the stronger man. The ghost of dead experience is as living as he.

Not so is it with Hector. All the passions of humanity are as new and fresh to him as if none before himself had known them. He looks neither forward nor back. The present is his concern. What though men have died and been forgotten, he will not lessen his utmost effort, even to the giving up of his life to save Troy. That is to him the one thing of importance. So robust is his courage, his faith, his love, that the sad spirit of memory within him cannot speak loud enough to make him hear. There is no warring of dual personalities in him; he is aware of but one—that rich momentary incarnation called Hector, more potent than the memories and experiences of the thousands of lives that preceded him, that gave him existence.

What though Achilles was right; what though both be but dust and legend now—who would not choose that flash of being called Hector—Hector dragged at the chariot-wheel of Achilles—Hector with wife enslaved and children slaughtered and his city's proud towers levelled with the plain, rather than to have been the haunted victor, triumphing but not triumphant; fighting without purpose or hope? The same end indeed came to both, but one died as he lived, for what he thought a glorious end, while the other too passed away—but with the cold knowledge that both deaths were fruitless and vain.

Troy is a dream, but the battle forever is waged between the fresh incarnation of being and the memories of past being. Every creature wakes out of childhood aware that he lives not alone in even the secretest chambers of his life. Which is the I he cannot always say. The two companions are never at one. Sometimes the struggle breaks into open flame. Sometimes the one is victor, sometimes the vanquished. Each fights for Helen, for his ideal of pleasure, of wisdom, or of good, but in the very handgrips of battle a chilling doubt will fall between them whether she for whom they war—call her virtue, beauty, lust, life, what you will—is the real Queen, or only some misleading eidolon whose true self is hid in distant Sparta; and so the grasp relaxes, the tense breath falls free, the selves mingle. Man gropes for truth and finds it vague, intangible, not to be grasped—a dream.

From 'The Life and Letters of Lafcadio Hearn.' Copyright, Houghton, Mifflin and Company, 1906, and used here by permission of the author and publishers.

It was to my juvenile admiration for this particular bit of work that I owed the privilege of meeting Lafcadio Hearn, in the winter of 1882, and of laying the foundation of a close friendship which lasted without a break until the day of his death.

He was at this time a most unusual and memorable person. About five feet, three inches in height, with unusually broad and powerful shoulders for such a stature, there was an almost feminine grace and lightness in his step and movements. His feet were small and well shaped, but he wore invariably the most clumsy and neglected shoes, and his whole dress was peculiar. His favorite coat, both winter and summer, was a heavy double-breasted "reefer," while the size of his wide-brimmed, soft crowned hat was a standing joke among his friends. The rest of his garments were apparently purchased for the sake of durability rather than beauty, with the exception of his linen, which, even in days of the direst poverty, was always fresh and good. Indeed a peculiar physical cleanliness was characteristic of him—that cleanliness of uncontaminated savages and wild animals, which has the air of being so essential and innate as to make the best-groomed man and domesticated beasts seem almost frowzy by contrast. His hands were very delicate and supple, with quick timid movements that were yet full of charm, and his voice was musical and very soft. He spoke always in short sentences, and the manner of his speech was very modest and deferential. His head was quite remarkably beautiful; the profile both bold and delicate, with admirable modelling of the nose, lips and chin. The brow was square, and full above the eyes, and the complexion a clear smooth olive. The enormous work which he demanded of his vision had enlarged beyond its natural size the eye upon which he depended for sight, but originally, before the accident—whose disfiguring effect he magnified and was exaggeratedly sensitive about—his eyes must have been handsome, for they were large, of a dark liquid brown, and heavily lashed. In conversation he frequently, almost instinctively, placed his hand over the injured eye to conceal it from his companion.

Though he was abnormally shy, particularly with strangers and women, this was not obvious in any awkwardness of manner; he was composed and dignified, though extremely silent and reserved until his confidence was obtained. With those whom he loved and trusted his voice and mental attitude were caressing, affectionate, and confiding, though with even these some chance look or tone or gesture would alarm him into sudden and silent flight, after which he might be invisible for days or weeks, appearing again as silently and suddenly, with no explanation of his having so abruptly taken wing. In spite of his limited sight he appeared to have the power to divine by some extra sense the slightest change of expression in the faces of those with whom he talked, and no object or tint escaped his observation. One of his habits while talking was to walk about, touching softly the furnishings of the room, or the flowers of the garden, picking up small objects for study with his pocket-glass, and meantime pouring out a stream of brilliant talk in a soft, half apologetic-tone, with constant deference to the opinions of his companions. Any idea advanced he received with respect, however much he might differ, and if a phrase or suggestion appealed to him his face lit with a most delightful irradiation of pleasure, and he never forgot it.

A more delightful or—at times—more fantastically witty companion it would be impossible to imagine, but it is equally impossible to attempt to convey his astounding sensitiveness. To remain on good terms with him it was necessary to be as patient and wary as one who stalks the hermit thrush to its nest. Any expression of anger or harshness to any one drove him to flight, any story of moral or physical pain sent him quivering away, and a look of ennui or resentment, even if but a passing emotion, and indulged in when his back was turned, was immediately conveyed to his consciousness in some occult fashion and he was off in an instant. Any attempt to detain or explain only increased the length of his absence. A description of his eccentricities of manner would be misleading if the result were to convey an impression of neurotic debility, for with this extreme sensitiveness was combined vigour of mind and body to an unusual degree—the delicacy was only of the spirit.

THE PUPPET SHOW

From 'Seekers in Sicily.' Copyright, John Lane Company, 1909, and used here by permission of the author and publishers.

It was in returning from this place of peace that he had that crowning inspiration about the puppet show, which is why in the darkness of that very evening they are threading a black and greasy alleyway which smells of garlic and raw fish. But they go cheerfully and confidently in the dimly seen wake of Gaspero's festal richness of attire.

An oil torch flares and reeks before a calico curtain. This curtain, brushed aside, shows a pigeon-hole room, nine feet high, very narrow, and not long. On either wall hangs a frail balcony, into one of which the three wriggle carefully and deposit themselves on a board hardly a palm's breadth wide. From the vantage point of these choice and expensive seats—for which they have magnificently squandered six cents apiece—they are enabled to look down about four inches on the heads of the commonalty standing closely packed into the narrow alley leading to the stage. A strictly masculine commonalty, for Gaspero explains in a whisper that the gentler sex of Palermo are not expected to frequent puppet shows, lest their delicate sensibilities may suffer shock from the broad behaviour of the wooden dolls. Of course, he hurries to add, handsomely, all things are permitted to forestieri, whose bold fantasticalities are taken for granted.

The groundlings appear to be such folk as fish peddlers, longshoremen, ragpickers—what you will—who smoke persistent tiny cigarettes, and refresh themselves frequently with orange juice, or anisette and water. These have plunged to the extent of two cents for their evening's amusement, and have an air of really not considering expense. The gallery folk are of a higher class. On Peripatetica's right hand sits one who has the aspect of an unsuccessful author or artist; immediately upon the entrance of the forestieri he carefully assumes an attitude of sarcastic detachment, as of one who lends himself to the pleasures of the people merely in search of material. Opposite is an unmistakable valet who also, after a quick glance at the newcomers, buttons his waistcoat and takes on an appearance of indulgent condescension to the situation.

A gay drop curtain, the size of a dinner napkin, rolls up after a preliminary twitter from concealed mandolins. The little scene is set in a wood. From the left enters a splendid miniature figure glittering in armour, crowned, plumed, and robed, stepping with a high melodramatic stride. It is King Charlemagne, the inevitable deus ex machina of every Sicilian puppet play. Taking the centre of the stage and the spotlight, he strikes his tin-clad bosom a resounding blow with his good right wooden hand, and bursts into passionate recitative:

"The cursed Moslem dogs have seized his subjects upon the high seas, and cast them into cruellest slavery. Baptised Christians bend their backs above the galley oars of Saracen pirate ships, and worse—oh, worst of all!"—both hands here play an enraged tattoo upon his resounding bosom-pan—"they have seized noble Christian maidens and haled them to their infernal harems.

"S'death! shall such things be? No! by his halidome, no! Rinaldo shall wipe this stain from his 'scutcheon. What ho—without there!"

Enter hastily from right, Orlando.

"His Majesty called?"

"Called? well rather! Go find me that good Knight Rinaldo the great Paladin, and get the very swiftest of moves on, or something will happen which is likely to be distinctly unpleasant."

Orlando vanishes, and in a twinkling appears Rinaldo, more shining, more resplendent, more befeathered even than the King; with an appalling stride (varied by a robin-like hop), calculated to daunt the boldest worm of a Moslem.

He awaits his sovereign's commands with ligneous dignity, but as the King pours out the tale his legs rattle with strained attention and when the Christian maids come into the story his falchion flashes uncontrollably from its sheath.

"Will he go? Will a bird fly? Will a fish swim?"

Charlemagne retires, leaving Rinaldo to plan the campaign with Orlando.

Enter now another person in armour, but wearing half an inch more of length of blue petticoat, and with luxuriant locks streaming from beneath the plumed helmet. 'Tis Bramante, the warrior maiden, who in shrill soprano declines to be left out of any chivalric ruction. Three six-inch swords flash in the candle light; three vows to conquer or die bring down the dinner napkin to tumultuous applause.

The pit has been absorbed to the point of letting its cigarettes go out, and the author and the valet hastily resume their forgotten condescension.

Every one cracks and eats melon seeds until the second act reveals the court of a Saracen palace.

The thumps of the three adventurers' striding feet bring out hasty swarms of black slaves, who fall like grain before the Christian swords. Better metal than this must meet a Paladin!

Turbaned warriors fling themselves into the fray, and the clash of steel on the steel rings through the palace. Orlando is down, Rinaldo and Bramante fight side by side, though Rinaldo staggers with wounds. The crescented turbans one by one roll in the dust, and as the two panting conquerors lean exhausted upon their bloody swords—enter the Soldan himself!

Now Turk meets Paladin, and comes the tug of war.

Bramante squeaks like a mouse; hops like a sparrow.

Ding, dong! Rinaldo is beaten to his knee and the Soldan shortens his blade for a final thrust, but—Bramante rushes in, and with one terrific sweep of her sword shears his head so clean from his shoulders that it rolls to the footlights and puts out one of the candles.

Ha! ha! He trusted in his false god, Mahound!

- Bramante hops violently.

Enter suddenly, rescued Christian Maid. Also in armour; also possessing piercing falsetto.

Saved! saved! She falls clattering upon Rinaldo's breast, and Bramante, after an instant's hesitation, falls there on top of her, with peculiar vicious intensity.

More dinner napkins. More frenzied applause. Gaspero draws a long breath. His eyes are full of tears of feeling.

Scene in the wood again. Charlemagne has thanked Rinaldo. Has thanked Bramante. Has blessed the Christian Maid, and has retired exhausted to his afternoon nap!

Christian Maid insists upon expressing her gratitude to the Paladin with her arms round his neck.

Bramante drags her off by her back hair, a dialogue ensuing which bears striking likeness to the interview of cats on a back fence.

Christian Maid opines that Bramante is no lady, and swords are out instantly.

One, two, three!—clash, slash, bang!

Rinaldo hops passionately and futilely around the two contestants.

Ladies! Ladies! he protests in agony, but blood is beginning to flow, when, suddenly, a clap of thunder—a glitter of lightning.

The cover of an ancient tomb in the wood rolls away, and from the black pit rises a grisly skeleton. Six legs clatter and rattle like pie-pans; swords fall. It is the ghost of Rinaldo's father. Christian Maid is really Rinaldo's sister, he explains, carried off by Saracens in her childhood.

Skeleton pulls down the cover of the tomb and retires to innocuous desuetude.

Opportune entry of Orlando miraculously cured of his wounds. Rinaldo has an inspiration, and bestows upon Orlando the hand of the Christian Maid.

All the tins of the kitchen tumble at once—everybody has fallen on every one else's mail-clad bosom! . . .

Dear Gaspero! It has been a wonderful day.

RICHARD HENRY WILDE

[1789—1847]

LEWIS PARKE CHAMBERLAYNE

THE events of Richard Henry Wilde's life are less interesting than his mind and character, yet the bare facts of his career, when known, help to explain the quality and the small number of his literary works. Writing at a time when patriotism was flamboyant in the United States, and sharing this love of country, he longed with all the ardor of a passionate nature for literary fame, but felt with ever increasing conviction that he at least was unable to produce poetry of a high order on American themes. Yet his native quality of mind prevented him from forgetting this disappointment in the triumphs of politics and the law, for he seems never to have been able to devote himself wholeheartedly to either, although, with the exception of his five years' sojourn in Europe, he remained always a politician or a lawyer. Outwardly his life was active and brought him honor both in Congress and in his profession, as well as in scholarship, but if we can judge from his posthumous poem, "Hesperia," his career was in his own eyes a failure.

He was born in Dublin, September 24, 1789, of well-to-do parents, and was brought to Baltimore at the age of eight, five years later accompanying his widowed mother and his brothers to Augusta, Georgia. The family was now poor, but Richard, who was the eldest, was ambitious and studious, working hard at his borrowed law-books while helping his mother in her shop, and was admitted to the Bar before he was of age. It is said he made a practice of reading fifty pages of law and writing ten pages of notes every day. His industry and courage were rewarded by quick success at the Bar, and he early gained a reputation by undertaking a case which required him to attack, in 1809, the constitutionality of the very popular Alleviating Law, making it impossible to sue for most kinds of debt. Shortly afterward he was elected Attorney-general of Georgia, and before he was twenty-seven he represented Georgia in Congress, being continuously in the delegation from his State from 1827 to 1835. The nomination for Speaker of the House in 1834, when he led on the first ballot against such men as Polk and Bell, testifies to his standing. Wilde was a Whig, opposed to Andrew Jackson's "Removal of the Deposits"; and his stand with the minority against the President's "Force Bill," in the dispute over nullification, finally lost him his seat. He had not been a warm partisan, not speaking very often, and then usually on questions of the tariff and finance. In his own words, he "found no party which did not require of its followers what no honest man should, and no gentleman would, do."

Wilde may have felt chagrin after his defeat, and at the same time, if we may trust indications afforded by passages in "Hesperia," there was another sorrow, an unhappy love, that made life in the United States wearisome and Italy particularly attractive to him. His wife, whom he had married in 1818, died in 1827, and about two years later he must have met in Washington the Italian lady to whom so many references are made in "Hesperia"; whom, if the poem is to be trusted, he loved till his death. So much at least we know—that the five years spent in Europe, mostly in Italy, were of the greatest importance in Wilde's life, and must have been among his happiest years. In Florence he lived three years, devoted to the study of Dante and Tasso, and the only long work that he published in his own lifetime was the fruit of this stay in Florence. This was his 'Conjectures and Researches Concerning the Love, Madness, and Imprisonment of Torquato Tasso' (2 vols. New York, 1842). He also began a life of Dante, which he never finished, and planned a collection of translations of the Italian lyric poets, with short biographies of the authors. The 'Researches Concerning Tasso' are based on those of Rossini, and contain an exhaustive examination of the sonnets and the canzone, as well as the correspondence of Tasso. The conclusion reached is that popular tradition is right in attributing Tasso's misfortunes in prime measure to the imprudent disclosure in his poems of his intrigue with Leonora d'Este, and that in consequence his imprisonment was punishment visited on him by the Duke. The charge of insanity Wilde considers a mere pretext for harsh treatment, though he admits that Tasso was subject to delusions of witchcraft, brought on, he thinks, by hardships in prison. The book is full of close argument and testifies to the author's learning and patience, although it is far from being easy reading. The Archivio Storico Italiano (Firenze, 1848), in a notice of Wilde's death, commends the "Tasso" as "showing, whatever may be thought of the correctness of the conclusions, no lack of diligence in collecting the confessions in Tasso's work, or of acumen in their examination, or of ingenuity in exposition of the resulting theory advanced." However, the "Tasso" will probably be forgotten sooner than his discovery, with others, Italians and Englishmen, of the portrait of Dante by Giotto under the whitewash which had hidden it for centuries on the walls of the Bargello of the Podestà in Florence. Wilde had many friends in Italy, and he speaks of it as sharing his love and allegiance with America. According to the Italian review quoted before, he had hopes of a diplomatic post there which were disappointed.

The events of his life after his return to this country in 1840 are soon told. In 1843 he removed to New Orleans, where he became the first professor of constitutional law in the University of Louisiana; in 1847 he fell a victim to the yellow fever epidemic of that year.

To the world in general, Wilde is the poet of one short lyric, "My Life is Like the Summer Rose." This was originally called simply "Stanzas," and was intended as a lyrical interlude in a projected epic on Florida, where the poet's younger brother had served in the first campaigns against the Seminoles. An Augusta wit translated the song into Greek, and printed it as a newly discovered ode of Alcaeus, and he found believers, though hardly among the dons of Oxford, as the legend in some forms goes. If we are not inclined to rank it so high as that, still, Poe certainly went too far in the other direction when he said better verses were to be found in every newspaper. It is a pretty song, and one line—"On that lone shore loud moans the sea"—deserves the praise it has always received for its rich vowel-color. But, after all, Wilde was not a singer, and recognized his deficiency, for he wrote but three other lyrics, his "Ode to Ease," "Star of My Love," and the "Farewell to America." The fault of all these poems as lyrics is Wilde's fatal fault—he never could develop his theme, hardly ever even show the theme in progression. Separate ideas are thrown off one after another, but of movement or growth there is none. This same trait is shown in his excessive use of exclamatory sentences, and lines consisting of disconnected words, all nouns, or all verbs, or all adjectives—word-lists, in short. His sonnet to Byron is marred by this fault, and in less degree his sonnet to the mocking-bird. In "Hesperia" there are more than eighty lines of this kind, as:

"Jew, Christian, Moslem, Persian, Brahmin, own," or
 "Fate! Destiny! Necessity! Stern, mute,
 Dread, passionless divinity! Whose sway
 Immovable, unsearchable, the brute
 Man, devils, saints, earth, heaven and hell obey."

In fact, Wilde, who was a lawyer by profession and a Congressman by avocation, treats his subjects more like an orator than like a poet. The "Ode to Ease" is a mass of negatives, and "Solomon and the Genius" a series of questions. Both lack the fire of poetry as much as they show rhetorical skill and training. Reading Wilde's poems give one rather the sensation of marking time than of advancing. Even in the descriptive passages, in which his accumulation of detail has a certain effect, he does not so much produce a picture as recount the objects he would like to combine into one. Perhaps his most successful description is that of the burning pine forest in "Hesperia," I, 61-65.

In that poem, as in the "Ode to Ease," Byron's influence is evident; as well the philosophy as the plan of the poem—descriptions and reflections strung on the thread of a journey—recall "Childe Harold," and we have Wilde's personal testimony in his sonnet to his admiration for Byron, in which, of course, he was typical of the period. Altogether, in spite of its entire lack of narrative interest, this posthumous poem, "Hesperia" (Hesperia, A Poem by Richard Henry Wilde, Edited by his Son, Boston, Ticknor and Fields, 1867) is the most valuable as it is the most ambitious of his poetical works. It is also the most interesting, though it is without plot or hero, beginning or end. The interest lies in the key it gives to the character of Wilde himself, whom we learn to know as a man of deep feeling and elevation of character, whose emotion must alter itself in verse but never succeeds in refining itself into poetry; the result has definite value for the student as an example of the literary ambitions and tastes of a widely-traveled, well-read, and thoughtful American of the mid-Nineteenth Century.

"Hesperia" shows an intimate personal acquaintance with all the eastern half of the United States. In its four cantos, Florida, Virginia, Acadia, and Louisiana, there are few picturesque localities, from the everglades to Massachusetts, and, turning south again, from the source of the Mississippi to New Orleans, that are not described or at least mentioned. Whenever Wilde refers to his own thoughts and feelings the tone is that of settled melancholy. In the dedication to the Marchioness Manfredina di Coenza, he writes: "You once advised me to attempt a poem of some length in hopes that an occupation suitable to my inclinations might divert my inexpressible weariness of life and spirit.

"You may remember my telling you some of the difficulties of such an undertaking. Few write well, except from personal experience—from what they have seen and felt—and modern life, in America especially, is utterly commonplace. It wants the objects and events which are essential to poetry—excludes all romance, and admits of but one enthusiasm.

"In addition to these inherent obstacles came my own want of invention, and the impossibility of adopting a foreign story, because the scenes and manners to be painted were unknown to me."

Compare with these words the stanzas 6-11 of the Canto I, and we have Wilde's greatest weakness expressed in his own words—inability to extract poetry from the life around him. It is the same old complaint, sounded then as now, on this side of the Atlantic and the other—"America is the land of deadly prose"—and it is true that the United States of Dickens's 'American Notes' does not seem a poetical country. Then, as now, there was gigantic energy in the country, but very little of it was expended on art. Moreover, such poetry as we had had barely begun to emerge from the imitative period. Poets, so called, there were in plenty—Wilde is only one of one hundred and twelve treated in Rufus Griswold's 'Poets and Poetry in America,'* but to the American public of the 'thirties, poetry meant generally picturesque verse on Old-World themes, or, on the other hand, elaborate treatment of American history in the manner of Scott or Moore. Already the demand was for a "national" poet, for the national note had been already sounded in politics; but while one field was filled with the figures of Calhoun, Webster, and Andrew Jackson, poetry makes but a poor show in comparison, with Poe, Bryant, and Longfellow. Wilde recognized at least the reason for the state of literature among us—our youthful civilization; but to fill the gap, by celebrating the life of America in a medium adapted to that life, and in a spirit worthy of our highest ideals, was for him, as it has remained for most of his successors, beyond his power.

He is at his best in philosophical reflection and satire, but even in his bitterest moods he does not attack persons, either types or individuals, but pure abstractions—as in his apostrophes to gold, Canto I, 94-106, and to the sword, II, 79-89. It would be interesting to know the date of the passage on evolution in Canto I, 42:

"In Nature . . . scorn superlative
Of individual life throughout we trace
And watchfulness unceasing o'er the race."

It was certainly written before stanza 55 of "In Memoriam," which was not published till three years after Wilde's death. The coincidence is interesting. Tennyson's lines are:

"Are God and Nature then at strife,
That Nature lends such evil dreams?
So careful of the type she seems,
So careless of the single life."

In still another, and that the first of these apostrophes, the riddle of human life and fate is the subject, and in stanzas 44-49 of Canto

*Ninth edition, Philadelphia, 1845.

III the mystery and awe of the stars in their courses, obeying the one "almighty everlasting power" of motion, are the inspiration of lines that remind the reader of the passage in "The City of Dreadful Night," beginning "How the moon triumphs through the endless nights." Here Wilde refuses belief in any other power than Fate, which he identifies with motion. But he is not consistently a skeptic. In the very next context he declares his belief in Divine Mercy. Most probably, like very many other pessimists, he made no attempt to be consistent in his philosophy; and before the end of the poem it is plain enough that personal griefs—griefs surely real though only shadowed forth—were the causes that lamed both his philosophy and his faith. In a less degree, but truly as in Thomson's case, the enemy must have been within—a "too quick sense of constant infelicity"—the old story of a will crippled by the corrosion of a melancholy it could not or would not shake off.

AMERICA TOO YOUNG FOR POETRY

Selections from "Hesperia."

For here is matter that the eye and mind
Heart, fancy, memory, could brood upon,
The deep pine forest waving in the wind,
The rapids hoarsely murmuring as they run,
The town within its zone of hills enshrined,
The broad, bright river glittering in the sun—
Such are the sights and sounds that might engage Man's better thoughts in this lone heritage.

And these are much and all!—what want we here
Of Arqua, but the poet's home and grave?
The woods are all as green, the skies as clear:
Nor is the sun less warm, less pure the wave:
But wanting these, the memories that endear
Spots haunted by the good or wise or brave,
Stream, grove, cliff, fountain, cataract and lake
Transient and slight emotions only wake!

Sweet as Egeria's, bore it but her name,
We have full many a grotto-guarded spring:
Streams not unworthy of Illysus' fame,
Did classic recollections only fling
Grace on their urns—mountains that well might claim
Eagles and poets of as bold a wing
As soared above Parnassus—vales that vie
With Tempé, in the hues of earth and sky!

But the heart seeks, and has forever sought,
Something that man has suffered or enjoyed,
And without human passion, action, thought,
Nature however beautiful is void:
'T is from deep feeling Poetry is wrought;
Such is the spell her master minds employed.
What wins for Arden's wood one Briton's tear
But pensive Jaques with his poor stricken deer?

Could we our country's scenery invest
With history or legendary lore,
Give to each valley an immortal guest,
Repeople with the past the desert shore,
Pass out where Hampdens bled or Shakespeares rest,
Exult o'er Memory's exhaustless store,
As our descendants centuries hence may do—
We should—and then shall have—our poets too!

THE BURNING PINE FOREST

(A description of a tornado.)

. . . And scarcely less terrific and sublime
The kindred element's triumphal glare,
Whose flaming wreaths like fiery dragons climb,
Hiss, dart, and flicker in the midnight air,
Making in hours a ruin which old Time
Even in a century can scarce repair;
How the red torrent drives before the wind
A blazing sea with burning wrecks behind!

Onward and onward still, the flames extend
 On every side, as far and fast as eye
 Can follow: clouds of smoke and sparks ascend,
 Dimming the stars and crimsoning the sky,
 Whose mingled tints a livid lustre lend
 Once more upon the conflagration gaze!
 To the pale streams that rush in terror by,
 As with loud crash, huge burning masses fall,
 And startled echo answers to their call!

Thousands of mighty victims prostrate glow;
 Round tens of thousands still the flames aspire,
 Drunk with the resinous tears and sweat that flow
 Wrung out by torture, and with fierce desire
 Quaffed off, as is the blood of mortal foe
 By the relentless savage in his ire:
 Here is a burnt offering that might claim
 Acceptance even by the God of Flame!

Those boundless colonnades of burning pine,
 Even more than Moscow's ruins might amaze
 Man's mind, as something wondrous and divine!
 Column, arch, dome and tower and chancel blaze,
 Spirit of Fire! thy palace or thy shrine.
 Dark Eblis, come! this dwelling thou alone
 Canst challenge! Come! ascend thy fiery throne!

APOSTROPHE TO GOLD

In my hot youth I did account thee base,
 Forsook thy worship and renounced thy name,
 Defied thy touch, ay! and blasphemed thy face
 For empty Pleasure and still emptier Fame:
 What brought they? Disappointment and Disgrace,
 Imputed faults and genius—pride and shame—
 False friends, that cooled, and summer loves, that flew
 With the first wintry withering blasts that blew.

I do repent me of that early sin,
The folly of my inconsiderate days;
And now, however late, would fain begin
To burn thee incense, and to hymn thy praise;
If all who truly worship thee may win,
I too would offer thee a laureate's lays—
Haply for ears tuned to sweet chimes unfit,
And yet not worse than have for Gold been writ.

Most subtle casuist! pure and calm and sweet—
Whose sure persuasion, eloquent though dumb,
Ever converted men the most discreet,
Or if it failed, failed only in the sum—
Where shall we find thee rank and title meet,
High Priestess of the Kingdom not to come—
Since even now thy rule and reign are seen,
Rock of all faiths—of every realm the queen?

Sinew of war! who bartering gold for steel
Reaps with such steel anew the golden grain;
Thine are the charms that even Cæsars feel,
Sovereign of Earth and mistress of the main,
Beneath whose shock, religions, empires reel,
And pontiffs', kings' and prophets' power is vain:
Sole subterranean monarch ever dear,
And never past the reach of Love or Fear!

True Poliorcetes!—conqueror of towns—
Corrupter of all virtue, rule, and state,
Sapper of treaties, oaths, and thrones and crowns,
Sole argument of most unquestioned weight—
Even Beauty yields beneath thy smiles or frowns,
Thou universal menstruum of Fate!
Solvent of statesmen and of vestal's vows,
The only spotless, pure, and perfect spouse!

Great Theologian! regent of each creed,
Philosopher of no one sect, but all—
Sceptic and Platonist in thee agreed,
And Evangelic Doctors hear thy call:

Thine is a voice that answers to the need
Of all "that stand as fearing they may fall:"
Jew, Christian, Moslem, Persian, Brahmin, own
Thou art above the altar and the throne!

Beneath thy ceaseless dropping-dew attacks,
Even adamantine Honor rusts away:
Before thy touch, severed like burning flax,
Love—Nature—Life's most holy ties decay;
Through thee alone doth Glory wane or wax,
And powers, thrones, creeds, dominions, own thy sway;
Ay, more—they pass from Earth and leave no sign.—
No power, throne, creed, opinion lasts but thine!

NIGHT, THE STARS, MOTION AND NECESSITY

'T is night! calm, lovely, silent, cloudless night!
Unnumbered stars on Heaven's blue ocean-stream,
Ships of Eternity! shed silver light,
Pure as an infant's or an angel's dream;
And still exhaustless, glorious, ever-bright,
Such as Creation's dawn beheld them beam,
In changeless orbits hold their ceaseless race
For endless ages over boundless space!

Amid those countless systems what is man?
A microscopic insect foul and fierce;
And yet his eye and intellect can scan
Those glorious orbs whose moments are his years,
Their size, weight, speed and figure, gauge and span,
And half the mystery of their movements pierce;
In reason, mind, thought, power, how like a God,
In sin a crawling reptile of the clod!

A mass of shifting atoms—whereof one
Is born each moment, and each moment dies,
As matter into life by motion won,
On its career, bright, brief, resistless, flies;

Or motion's mystery ceasing, as begun,
(Save in effect untraced by mortal eyes)
Sinks putrid, stagnant, cold its loveliest forms,
To soar or crawl again in flies or worms!

By ceaseless motion all that is exists,
Through ceaseless motion all existence dies;
Motion alone eternally subsists
Ruling the sun and stars and sea and skies,
Self moved, in moving matter it persists
And changing all, unchanged, man's thought defies;
Space but a point, eternity an hour,
To that Almighty, Everlasting Power!

Among those spheres Man hopes to find his rest,
Yet sinks beneath his appetite's control:
Dreams of perpetual rapture with the blest,
While swilling brutishly from Circe's bowl:
A strange compound of Nature's worst and best,
The body of a beast—an angel's soul—
Which less than instinct, more than reason wields,
For glory struggles, and to impulse yields!

He reads earth, air and ocean's certain laws
Yet acts as if he swayed the world at will:
Traces creation up to one fixed cause,
But no self-knowledge gains from all his skill:
Slave of his slaves!—by passion's starts and flaws
Forever driven, though panting to be still;
And when some weary nerve with anguish jars
Calling God's vengeance down upon the stars!

Fate! Destiny! Necessity! Stern, mute,
Dread, passionless Divinity! whose sway
Immovable, unsearchable, the brute,
Men, devils, saints, earth, heaven and hell obey;
None can o'ertake thee, none from thy pursuit,
Stars, spirits, angels, seraphs, flee away;
Great Alpha and Omega, Law of laws,
Eternal circle of effect and cause!

Thou who ne'er changest a decree once made,
Who never heeded tears or prayers or sighs;
To whom no vows or offerings are paid,
For whom no altar, fane or incense rise;
Thou who beholdest states and empires fade,
And suns and systems with the same cold eyes
That first beheld their fixed predestined doom
Long ere the universe was in its womb!

Whom it were weak to praise and vain to blame,
Useless to seek or scan—accuse—defend,
Through space and ages all unmoved, the same,
Whom none can make their foe, and none their friend;
Whose bolt none ever traced to whence it came,
And none shall ever follow to its end: —
From earth to heaven we track the lightning's path,
But dark alike thy pleasure and thy wrath!

Thee therefore I implore not—neither brave,
Most calm inscrutable! whate'er thou art,
I meet my doom, and neither shun nor crave
Thought, word nor deed past my allotted part;
Thou mad'st me what I am, an humble slave,
And what thou gav'st is here—a passive heart!
To me past, present, future are the same,
Fragments of Fate that differ but in name!

And yet it is a deep and solemn thought,
For mortal man, that nothing is in vain;
From all he felt and suffered, shunned or sought,
Reaches an endless all pervading chain,
And, dyed with every act and word and thought Infinitude—Eternity remain!
That which is done, is done, and good or ill,
Throughout all time its mission must fulfill.

This living lyre, whose thousand strings ajar,
Grating harsh discord, shriek and crash and groan—
This will and power evermore at war—
This thirst to know what never can be known—

This reason soaring past the farthest star,
And blindly stumbling o'er the smallest stone—
This obstinate self-will that beats its breast
Against its prison bars, and knows no rest: —

This sensual body and this subtile spirit,
These endless longings, and this ceaseless strife—
These hopes by Faith or Penitence to merit,
For momentary ills, Eternal Life—
These bonds of circumstance that all inherit—
This fond belief with which the world is rife,
That act, thought, motive with ourselves begin,
And wish and power to sin or not to sin:—

All these though transitory as a breath,
Produce their consequence, however small;
Atoms of causes!—yet defying death,
Outliving time and thought, pervading all!
The Universe, throughout its length and width
Feels their effect forever past recall!
'T is well Almighty goodness, power, and skill,
"Shapes all our ends, rough hew them as we will."

STAR OF MY LOVE

"This is my star: we will look at it every night and think of each other." "Il y a parmi ces étoiles un amour éternel qui peut seul suffire à l'immensité de nos vœux."

Star of my Love! how brightly burns
Thy mild, pure, tranquil flame to-night!
Though thousands from their crystal urns
Are pouring floods of silver light,
In thine alone I take delight,
For one who in my absence mourns
Now gazes on thee in thy flight,
And every look I give returns,
And therefore dost thou seem so bright,
Star of my Love!

Star of my Love! while thus on high
Thy kindred hosts their vigils keep,
Careering through the dark-blue sky,
And earth seems sunk in slumber deep,
There yet are those who do not sleep,
But gaze upon thee with a sigh,
And eyes that long, yet scorn, to weep,
While gloomy clouds across thee fly,
Like thoughts that o'er our fancies sweep,
Star of my Love!

Star of my Love! I see thee shine
E'en now as when thou met'st the gaze
Of one whose hand was clasped in mine
When last we saw thy glories blaze.
Then as we marked thy beauteous rays,
With spirits soft and pure as thine,
We asked thine aid in thorny ways
And bowed our hearts before thy shrine,
With souls all gratitude and praise.
Star of my Love!

Star of my Love! . . . most lovely star
Of all in heaven's high temple hung,
Though wandering now asunder far,
Thou hast for us an angel's tongue:—
Thou saw'st the parting pangs that wrung
Our bosoms from thy silvery car;
For us thy golden lyre was strung
To Him who made us what we are,
And thus to thee our hymn is sung,
Star of my Love!

STANZAS

My life is like the summer rose
That opens to the morning sky,
But ere the shades of evening close,
Is scattered on the ground—to die!
Yet on the rose's humble bed
The sweetest dews of night are shed,
As if she wept the waste to see—
But none shall weep a tear for me!

My life is like the autumn leaf
That trembles in the moon's pale ray,
Its hold is frail—its date is brief,
Restless—and soon to pass away!
Yet ere that leaf shall fall and fade
The parent tree will mourn its shade,
The winds bewail the leafless tree,
But none shall breathe a sigh for me!

My life is like the prints, which feet
Have left on Tampa's desert strand;
Soon as the rising tide shall beat,
All trace will vanish from the sand:
Yet as if grieving to efface
All vestige of the human race,
On that lone shore loud moans the sea,
But none, alas! shall mourn for me!

TO LORD BYRON

Byron! 't is thine alone on eagles' pinions,
In solitary strength and grandeur soaring
To dazzle and delight all eyes; outpouring
The electric blaze on tyrants and their minions;
Earth, sea, and air, and powers and dominions,
Nature, man, time, the universe exploring;
And from the wreck of worlds, thrones, creeds, opinion
Thought, beauty, eloquence, and wisdom storing:

O! how I love and envy thee thy glory,
To every age and clime alike belonging;
Link'd by all tongues with every nation's glory
Thou Tacitus of song! whose echoes thronging
O'er the Atlantic, fill the mountains hoary
And forests with the name my verse is wronging.

TO THE MOCKING-BIRD

Wing'd mimic of the woods! thou motley fool!
Who shall thy gay buffoonery describe?
Thine ever-ready notes of ridicule
Pursue thy fellows still with jest and gibe:
Wit, sophist, songster, Yorick of thy tribe,
Thou sportive satirist of Nature's school;
To thee the palm of scoffing we ascribe,
Arch-mocker and mad Abbot of Misrule!
For such thou art by day—but all night long
Thou pour'st a soft, sweet, pensive, solemn strain,
As if thou did'st in this thy moonlight song
Like to the melancholy Jaques complain,
Musing on falsehood, folly, vice and wrong,
And sighing for thy motley coat again.

CALVIN HENDERSON WILEY

[1819—1887]

J. Y. JOYNER

CALVIN HENDERSON WILEY, the son of David L. Wiley and Anne Woodburn, was born in Guilford County, North Carolina, February 3, 1819, and died in Winston, North Carolina, January 11, 1887. His ancestors moved into the State from Pennsylvania in 1754. His parents were pious Presbyterians, and he was named for two Presbyterian ministers, the great John Calvin and the Rev. Dr. Henderson, his mother's old pastor. It was the desire of his mother's heart that her son should become a Presbyterian minister. He was prepared for college at Caldwell Institute, in Greensboro, North Carolina, conducted under the auspices of the Orange Presbytery, and one of the most celebrated preparatory schools in the State. He was graduated from the University of North Carolina in 1840 with the highest honors.

Not feeling the sacred call to the ministry, however, he selected law as his profession, was admitted to the Bar in 1841, and immediately settled in Oxford, North Carolina, practicing his profession there until 1849. His tastes, however, turned him to literary pursuits, and all his spare time was devoted to these. He edited the Oxford Mercury from 1841 to 1843. In 1847 he published a novel entitled 'Alamance: or, the Great and Final Experiment.' In 1849 he published a second novel entitled 'Roanoke: or Where is Utopia?' Both novels were based on North Carolina history and were widely read and popular in the State. In 1849 he returned to his native county of Guilford and was elected by the Whigs a member of the General Assembly of 1850-1851. At this session of the General Assembly he introduced and championed in a speech of great power and eloquence a bill "to provide for the appointment of a Superintendent of Common Schools and for other purposes." This bill, however, was defeated. He was re-elected from Guilford a member of the General Assembly of 1852-1853; and through his influence mainly his bill, with a few changes, was re-introduced by Mr. Cherry, of Bertie, a Democrat, and passed by a Democratic Legislature. Though a Whig, he was elected the first Superintendent of Common Schools by a Democratic Legislature in December, 1852, and assumed the duties of his office January 1, 1853. He held this office continuously, by reëlection by his political opponents, and discharged its duties with marked ability until October, 1865.

In 1862 he married Miss Mittie Towles, of Raleigh, who, with five children, still survives him. In 1866 he was ordained a Presbyterian minister, though he never held a regular charge. In 1881 the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by his alma mater, the University of North Carolina. In 1869 he moved to Jonesboro, Tennessee, where he served for several years with marked success as general agent of the American Bible Society for eastern and middle Tennessee. In 1874 he returned to North Carolina, taking up his residence at Winston and serving until his death as general agent of the American Bible Society for North and South Carolina. In 1883 he organized the Winston city schools and was elected chairman of the board of trustees, filling this position with the greatest acceptability until his death.

The signal service rendered by Calvin H. Wiley was in organizing and bringing to efficiency the public school system of the State of North Carolina. For this service he has won a place in the hearts of his people and shall receive the undying gratitude of generations yet unborn as they shall learn from history's shining page the everlasting debt they owe. Wiley early became a close observer and student of the industrial and educational conditions of his State. His ancestors had been present at the Battle of Alamance, which was the first baptism of blood on American soil for freedom from the thralldom of unjust taxation. His grandfather was a soldier of the Revolution. Love for his State and his people was one of the ruling passions that beat with Wiley's blood.

His patriotic heart was filled with unutterable sadness at the tragic spectacle of thousands of the citizens of his beloved State emigrating to other states, leaving behind them deserted homes and devastated fields. With fine feeling and splendid eloquence, he wrote and spoke against this disastrous emigration of the State's citizens. "The ruinous effects," he wrote, "are eloquently recorded in deserted farms, in wide wastes of guttered sedge-fields, in neglected resources, in the absence of improvements, and in the hardships, sacrifices, and sorrows of constant emigration." He reached the conclusion that this deplorable condition and this disastrous depopulation were largely the result of ignorance—ignorance of the wonderful resources and possibilities of their own State, ignorance of the means of making the most of these, and ignorance of the numerous disadvantages of many of the regions to which they were moving. He saw but one remedy—universal education. He saw but one way to secure this—an efficient system of public schools. Moved by an unselfish love of his home and his people, and urged by fear of impending disaster to both, he turned aside from his chosen profession, laid aside every cherished ambition of literary fame, and set himself resolutely to the task of building up a system of public schools for the education and emancipation of all his people. It was a herculean task. The story of how Wiley performed it is inspiring and heroic.

Wiley entered upon the performance of his task with the courage and wisdom, the hope and enthusiasm, of a great man inspired by the consciousness of a great mission. He reduced to order the chaos prevailing in the public school system. He secured the application of more business-like methods in the management of the school funds. He collected, printed, and circulated a digest of the school laws. By printed addresses and official circulars he instructed school officers in their duties and disseminated information about the schools and their work. By dint of everlasting insistence, he collected from school officials fuller and more accurate knowledge of the work and embodied it in able reports to the Governor and the General Assembly. He traveled in his old-fashioned buggy from one end of the State to the other, studying the schools and the people, conferring with friends of the system, teachers and school officers, and making public addresses on education at the county seats of the counties visited. With infinite tact and judgment, born of a shrewd knowledge of men and affairs, he secured the support and active interest of politicians, statesmen, leading citizens of all classes and all sections of the State; he silenced opposition here and answered criticism there; he utilized the press and every other available agency for cultivating public sentiment, awakening interest and disseminating information about the schools; he organized teachers, editors, and other friends of education into the Educational Association of North Carolina, which proved a powerful ally in his work; he organized teachers' associations and library associations in the various counties. Realizing the need of a voice as well as a head for the cause, he established the North Carolina Journal of Education, placed it in the hands of school officials and teachers, and thus made it an effective medium of communication with his coworkers.

In a social order that was at that time aristocratic rather than democratic, one of the chief obstacles to the progress of the common schools was the prevalent, but false, idea that public schools were a public charity, fit only for the children of the poor. Wiley successfully combated that idea and inculcated the idea that they were a necessary part of the governmental machinery, to be supported by taxation as were the other necessary parts of the machinery of a great government, and that they would be good enough for the poorest only when they were made good enough for the richest. With rare tact he overcame the antagonism of the "old-field" school-teachers, whose business was largely destroyed by the common schools, and forestalled the incipient opposition of private academies and colleges. By wise amendments to the law, and constant appeals and instructions to the examiners and other officers, he succeeded in establishing a standard of moral and intellectual qualifications for teachers. He had begun before his election as superintendent the preparation of a series of North Carolina Readers, with a view of inculcating in the rising generation a knowledge of the history and the wonderful resources of their State, and of infusing into them a spirit of patriotism and pride of state. When he came into office he unselfishly gave up all financial interest in the series of readers, in order that he might be free to secure their introduction into the common schools. The influence of these readers in the cultivation of such a spirit of pride and patriotism in the minds and hearts of that generation of North Carolinians, and in checking the disastrous drain upon the best blood of the State by emigration to other states, no man can measure.

In the short compass of a brief sketch like this, it is possible to give only the barest outline of the splendid work of this great man for the common schools of the State. In his own words, he was "all things to the schools and had to be for a time at least a guide to them, to public sentiment, and to the Legislature, with no guide or support for himself in the community or in the neighboring States." Under his shaping hand the system grew and improved and the schools prospered until at the beginning of the Civil War it was truthfully asserted and generally admitted that North Carolina had the best system of common schools in the South. So marked had been the success of the system that it had attracted general attention abroad, and a number of the Southern States had followed the example of North Carolina and modeled their systems largely after hers. Wiley was applied to from various Southern States for suggestions and plans, and was invited to visit the Legislatures of some of these to address their committees on education.

Such was the general condition of the public school system of North Carolina at the outbreak of the Civil War. Throughout this period of revolution, Wiley stood bravely by his trust, continued at his post, and mainly through his power and influence held intact the "Literary Fund" for the support of the public schools. Notwithstanding the great financial straits of the State during these dark days, and the frequent efforts of the Legislature to use this fund to meet the crying needs of war, no Legislature dared to lay unholy hands upon this sacred fund. The public schools of North Carolina, mainly through the tact, wisdom, and devotion of this one man, were kept open throughout the entire war; and when the first news of General Joseph E. Johnston's surrender, which occurred near Raleigh, reached Dr. Wiley, he was in his office receiving reports from the public schools. In his last report made to Governor Worth, dated January 16, 1866, Dr. Wiley says: "To the lasting honor of North Carolina, her public schools survived the terrible shock of cruel war, and the State of the South which furnished most material and the greatest number of the bravest troops of the war did more than all the others for the cause of popular education. The common schools lived and discharged their useful mission through all the gloom and trials of the conflict, and when the last gun was fired, and veteran armies once hostile were meeting and embracing in peace upon our soil, the doors were still open and they numbered their pupils by the scores of thousands." He did not say, but we may say with truth, that to the eloquence, the zeal, the vigilance, the courage, the devotion, the wisdom, the tact, the power, the energy and the influence of the great superintendent of her public schools was mainly due the credit of this honorable record.

Dr. Wiley's term of office ended October 19, 1865, by an ordinance of the Constitutional Convention declaring all offices vacant. He served as Superintendent of Common Schools thirteen years. Though he was a Whig in politics, and exercised the privilege of voting his political convictions, he ever held his work above politics, was frequently reelected by Democratic Legislatures, and had the coöperation of the leaders and the best people of both political parties. In recognition of his ability and splendid services, the Democratic nomination for Superintendent of Public Instruction was tendered to him in 1876, but was declined on the ground that the office had become a political one, and that his sacred calling of minister made it improper for him to engage in political debate. After the close of the war a new system of public schools was built up in North Carolina on the old foundation laid by Dr. Wiley.

He never lost his interest in the public schools. With pen and voice he labored for the advancement of the people's schools until the day of his death. His last service to the cause was rendered in the establishment of an admirable public school system in the city of Winston, where he resided. There was the tender touch of a father's love for a child in his devotion to these schools. In 1904 a monument was erected to his memory by the contributions of the children of the Winston public schools, and it now stands on the public school grounds, an everlasting memorial of love and gratitude for the last splendid service of an old man to a cause for which his life was spent.

As a writer and speaker on educational subjects, Dr. Wiley deserves to rank among the greatest. His reputation was national. At the National Convention of Educators in Cincinnati, in 1858, Dr. Wiley's name is found on the program as "one of the distinguished educators who would address the Convention," along with that of Horace Mann. His school reports and other writings on educational subjects were quoted with approval and commented upon favorably throughout the United States. Parts of his report of 1855 read like blank verse and deserve to rank forever as educational classics. His style is scholarly, finished, lucid, dignified, forceful. At times it is figurative, eloquent, evincing by occasional flights of a fine imagination and occasional outbursts of fine passion the literary temperament and taste. But he was much more than a mere educational writer and orator. The work that he performed, the story of which I have told briefly but inadequately in this sketch, entitles him to rank among the great constructive educational statesmen of our country.

A PLEA FOR THE EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE

From "The First Annual Report of the General Superintendent of Common Schools," 1854.

To make a nation truly great and happy its heart and mind should both be educated; and the undue cultivation of one of these to the neglect of the other, will lead to inevitable injury. Among a population wholly ignorant, wicked and designing men avail themselves of the pious and reverential tendencies of the human heart to enslave and oppress the multitude in the name of religion; while a people educated with the sole idea that the chief end of man is to make money and acquire power, and to use them for the indulgence of his passions, will in the end first become slaves to their appetites and then to a more self-denying race. Extreme care, therefore, should be taken to improve the heart and subdue its passions, as the mind is enlightened; and a grave responsibility rests on every Teacher as well as parent to enforce on children the injunction to remember their Creator in the days of their youth. Religion and education must go together; and while contemplating the possibility of a future generation of North Carolinians wholly enlightened and universally able to take care of themselves, in a worldly point of view, I cannot but feel a deep solicitude that it should not be an infidel generation, devoted to Mammon, and ready to abase itself to all the strange gods which the wicked inventions of men may create.

To enforce, however, a wholesome morality is not more important than to guard against all sectarian influences in our public schools; and those who have their direction should have constantly at heart these two cardinal objects.

As far as my influence would extend I have exerted it, and shall continue to exert it, in favor of the employment of Teachers whose morals are wholly above reproach; and while the Word of God, the common creed of all christian denominations, has not been recommended as a text-book for the schools, every child should have access to it and be allowed to read it, and to judge and choose for itself. This is in accordance with our fundamental political doctrine; and it is in accordance with the idea that man is a responsible free agent, each individual accountable for his own life and opinions, to the One Divine Master of all.

It is my desire that all children shall be taught to read, and taught by those whose lives illustrate the beauties of a heart disciplined to good; and that when enabled to read they be allowed to read for themselves the revelations of Heaven's will to man.

In connection with this subject I feel bound to take notice of an evil which needs correction, and which seems to be incidental to a system of free schools, in the primary stages of their existence.

When we send our children to colleges, academies and select schools, we send them with a view to their instruction and improvement; every child is compelled to get the proper kind of books, to submit to discipline and to study or be disgraced.

It seems to be thought, in some places, that a free school is one where entire freedom of action is to be guaranteed to the pupil; and entertaining these erroneous notions, parents not unfrequently prevent the improvement of their children by refusing to permit them to be corrected, or submit to discipline necessary to chasten and restrain the wayward disposition and the prurient passions of youth.

Sometimes, wholly mis-interpreting the idea of Free schools, they think they are schools where children are to be free to do as they please; and forgetting that free men are those who have enslaved their own passions, they unwisely and with a cruel kindness permit their offspring to grow up with such indulgences as prevent the formation of a manly character, destroy their energy, and cause them to lag and faint behind their better disciplined fellows in the race for power and position. Even Kings and Emperors have those who are to inherit their power carefully instructed in youth, causing them to undergo the most thorough training to develop all those qualities which make the self-reliant hero, and reduce to subjection those passions and tendencies which, if allowed to grow with our growth, render the man a mere child in the great conflicts of life. And if all the people would follow this example there would not be one King to own and rule a nation—each individual citizen would be a sovereign, considerate to equals, but acknowledging no superior.

It does seem to me that something is needed in this respect; and I wish to see our Common Schools turning out a generation of men and women with childish appetites subdued and indolent propensities overcome, and with all the sovereign attributes of free citizens and of the mothers of free men, in a state of healthy development. It should be a maxim, known and received of all, that free children do not make free men; and it should be equally well known that children can be governed and trained without recourse to brutal punishment, or to that rigorous discipline which blights all the generous bloom of the youthful heart. They must be trained, but trained as delicate beings, full of keen susceptibilities, of generous emotions, and of loving natures; and while the noxious weeds are carefully eradicated, not one harmless blossom should be touched, whether the blossom be the promise of future fruit or the mere embellishment of a kindly soil.

While an arrogant and self-sufficient egotism is as disgusting and sinful in nations as in individuals, a proper self-respect and love of home are essential to the welfare of each; they are virtues in themselves and the parents of a whole family of other virtues. Till that millennial era when we will regard the world as our country and all men as our kindred, they lie at the foundation of most improvements; they are the promoters of benevolent enterprises, and of self-denials, lead to those sublime sacrifices which constitute true patriotism, and promote those institutions which make home comfortable and secure. Efforts to promote the love of home, in the plastic nature of childhood, are peculiarly becoming in North Carolina, a State where the want of this attachment and its ruinous effects are eloquently recorded in deserted farms, in wide wastes of guttered sedge-fields, in neglected resources, in the absence of improvements, and in the hardships, sacrifices and sorrows of constant emigration.

Our State has long been regarded by its own citizens as a mere nursery to grow up in; and, from my earliest youth, I have witnessed the sad effects of this in the families of my acquaintance, many of such being scattered from the homes of their nativity over the wide south-west, some without bettering their fortunes, some to become ever afterwards unsettled, and not a few to find nameless graves by the wild road side. Such is the experience of all or nearly all. As a private citizen I have long resolved in my mind plans for the removal of this infatuation; and as I have intimated, in another place, I undertook a series of North Carolina Readers to be used in our schools, partly with the object in view named above. The first number, received with more flattering commendations than its intrinsic merits deserved, was finding its way into the schools; and I know of instances in which, imperfect as it is, it has produced among children an intense desire to know more about North Carolina, and of other cases where, for good or evil, it has arrested thoughts of emigration and prompted to investments in the State.

What would be the effect of a good series in universal use? To accomplish this has been an aim with me; and that I might do as much good as possible, I have refused to be personally interested in any form, and have given away the copyright of my Reader at cost of materials, on the conditions before named. As a farther means of promoting the same end, I have, as before stated, issued a handbill, partly with this view, to be posted in every schoolhouse; and I have in contemplation to prepare a series of simple questions, with answers to be given by the teacher, to familiarize in the minds of children, the name and style of the United States—the name of the President, the character of the Government, as distinguished from all other Governments; the name of the State and county in which they live, the name of the Governor, the position of each person as part of the Government, and the wish of all good men, all over the earth, that this Government in its purity might be perpetual. Something of this kind has been adopted in those German States where they have the best systems of Public Schools; and the eminent American writers who have visited them, speak with admiration of the effects.

The Geography recommended, with my Appendix, will do justice to the State, and no more than strict justice; and indeed the Publishers, anxious not to be partial, took the liberty of modifying the text in one respect, which, though right in a work of the kind, I rather regretted at the time.

The matter to which I allude is this: the time is coming when very material changes will be effected in the routes of commerce. All things considered, the finest agricultural country in the world is the valley of the Mississippi, and its tributaries; and for all the immense productions of this region that do not take a circuitous route to the North, the distant mouth of the Mississippi River, in the stormy Gulf of Mexico, affords the principal outlet to the ocean. New Orleans is the entrepot; and though it has had to contend against heavy disadvantages, from its location, the same location has forced it to be a great city.

Between the nearer Atlantic and this vast granary of the west and south-west, stands the interposing barrier of the Alleghany Mountains, long thought to be an impassable wall, and a limit to the iron track of commerce.

But modern science has overcome greater difficulties to secure that modern desideratum, the shortest passage; and the gallant States of Virginia and Georgia are already storming these heights with every prospect of success. South Carolina will follow in the assault; and none of these have so great inducements to undertake the enterprise as the people of North Carolina. Nearly midway of the Atlantic coast, in a temperate and healthy climate, is the unchangeable, safe, and capacious harbor of Beaufort; and from hence, through our fertile upland slopes, and the gorges of our own beautiful mountains, lies the shortest route to the great south-west.

To foreshadow the grand commercial destiny we might attain, on the youthful mind of the State, and prepare it to grasp and realise the magnificent consummation, I took much pains to have all the proposed railroads over the mountains, and their bearings and connections made familiar to the publishers of the Geography in question; and I also described our own port and its probable connections with the west in such a way as to do what I considered full justice to the subject. The publishers, issuing a general work, slightly modified the prominent idea in my text; but of this I cannot complain.

The State already occupies in the work the largest space of any other, with its railroad routes noticed and Beaufort handsomely described. Its map is the fullest and most carefully prepared, while in other respects the work is a faithful and accurate compend of the general outlines of Geography. It deserves to be universally used in our schools, and I hereby recommend it.

THE BATTLE OF MOORE'S CREEK BRIDGE

'Adventures of Old Dan Tucker and his Son Walter.'

GENERAL McDONALD, with an array of four thousand gallant Scots was marching towards Wilmington, having crossed the Cape Fear, and eluded the vigilance of Moore, when he heard of an obstruction in his path. On the farther side of a creek called Moore's Creek there lay encamped, as his scouts told him, a handful of militia under Colonel Lillington; and the general, after a short council, resolved to surprise and cut to pieces the daring patriots. He learned that Lillington had with him only five hundred men, but that Colonel Caswell was rapidly marching towards him with about five hundred more; and to prevent this junction, and to destroy the two regiments in detail, was the object of the Scotchman. He therefore marched suddenly and expeditiously towards Lillington, who came near being taken by surprise. His camp he had before fortified; and now the planks were taken from the bridge over the creek, the sleepers greased and fortified by a tête-de-pont; and then going familiarly among his men, the colonel prepared them for a bloody and desperate struggle. "Victory or death," was to be the motto; and on the iron heart of every soldier in the patriot camp was it engraven. Coolly and sternly they awaited the onset; while in the Scottish army not a soul doubted the result, unless it was the general himself, who was so ill that McLeod, the second in command, had to take his place. At break of day the Scotch, in beautiful array, with shouts and martial clangour, were seen marching along the creek; but there was not a word nor a whisper heard among the men of Lillington. Suddenly a broad sheet of flame burst along the ranks of these, and the head of the Scottish column staggered backwards as many a gallant soldier fell from its ranks. Again they were rallied by McLeod, who, waving his sword over his head, actually crossed the bridge; but another and more deadly fire swept off the entire head of the column, McLeod himself falling mortally wounded. In this second and destructive volley, the men of Caswell joined; and as Campbell, the third in command among the Scots, formed their ranks, a third discharge killed him with nearly one-fourth of his remaining men. Lillington now gave the word to charge; the planks were instantly thrown down, and the clash of swords and bayonets indicated the last deadly struggle. Everywhere the Scotch were beaten; but there was among them one whose gallant bearing attracted the attention of friend and foe.

Cool, stern, and wary, he still refused to surrender, and with a few devoted followers hewed his way from point to point in the patriot ranks; and after all hope of victory had fled, and he was alone without a follower, he still opened a path before him, his sword dripping with blood and his uniform cut to pieces. As he was thus slowly making his way towards a body of still resolute Scots, he was suddenly confronted by a young officer, who hailed him.

"Who among these patriot dogs knows my name," said Chester Rowton, throwing back the clotted hair from his face.

"I, the avenger of innocence," cried Walter Tucker; "and I thank God for this hour, which I have so long prayed for!"

"I will end your troubles, vain boy," replied Rowton, as he took his guard and coolly parried the strokes which Walter furiously showered upon him. "You the avenger of innocence!" cried he with a scornful laugh, as he shivered Walter's sword; "You the avenger of innocence! I'll send you to the other world before me," and his brandished sword glittered near the head of the defenceless antagonist.

But here a third actor intervened.

"I'm the avenger," cried he, with wild and terrible energy, and as he spoke, plunged a dagger to the Englishman's heart; "I'm the avenger," he continued, leaping into the air and brandishing his dagger. "Ha, ha! the day of retribution has come at last! Vengeance is sweet, sweet, oh how sweet!" and he again plunged the dagger to the heart of his dying victim.

"He's dead," said the youth, as the pallor of the last foe overspread the countenance of the Englishman; "he's dead!"

and he's forgiven. Chester, Chester, my dear lord, take me with you!" and falling on his neck, the maniac youth and his victim expired together. Such was the end of Chester Rowton and of Polly Dawson, the beautiful, and until she saw him, the happy belle of Utopia.

The struggle was over, and the whole Scotch army was killed or taken captive. Among the former were McLeod and Campbell, the second and third in command; and among the latter General McDonald.

This was one of the most decisive and important victories achieved during the revolution; for with this ended the royal sway in North Carolina. The armament in the Cape Fear, with Sir Henry Clinton and Lord Cornwallis, soon left without doing any damage; the Scotch settlements were broken up, the negroes kept in subjection, and the Indians beaten and overawed. The Tories were everywhere intimidated, and the Whigs made confident; the governor was driven off in disgrace, and North Carolina was, from this day, a free and independent state. Such were the effects of the battle of Moore's Creek, fought by eleven or twelve hundred militia, in 1776, against four thousand Highland Scotchmen; and yet who out of North Carolina has heard of Moore's Creek, or of its heroes, Lillington and Caswell?

The brave, and great, and good, are born everywhere; in some places they neglect them, in others they crucify and stone them, and in others heap rubbish on their heads and suffer them to starve. In some very few places these evidences of man's immortality are humanely treated by the natures they ennoble. Some may object to these reflections in such a place; but who can recount the deeds of men, their eternal fights and feuds, without feeling disposed to moralize on the melancholy tale of blood and crime?

On the night after the engagement at Moore's Creek, Walter Tucker was introduced to Colonel Lillington by Richard Caswell.

"To this young man I am greatly indebted," said Caswell; "and, indeed, the whole country owes him a debt. From him I got the information which caused my rapid movements in this direction; and I have been surprised at his military tact and skill."

"I am happy to make your acquaintance," answered Lillington, speaking to Walter; "I have heard of you before; your visit to Rock Castle was, perhaps, one of the causes of my being here to-night. By the way, have you not a relation in the camp, a noted fiddler?"

"I have a father who plays on the violin," said Walter, colouring; "but surely he cannot be here."

"There is one here of the name of Tucker—my attention was called to him by a singular incident. I observed him coming up with some three or four followers, just at the termination of the engagement; and so eager did they seem that one of them, a furious little Frenchman, flung the scabbard of his sword away, as he ran over the bridge crying, "Begar, ve vil be in at de suppaire!"

"This must be the old gentleman of New Berne who requested permission to join my regiment with a company, and whom I left diligently recruiting. They called him Old Dan—and I heard that he was a famous fiddler."

"That is my father," said Walter; "I must endeavour to find him."

"With your permission we will walk with you," spoke Lillington, "for I would be delighted to form the old gentleman's acquaintance."

"Certainly," answered Walter, though his heart misgave him that he would be covered with shame by the old plebeian's manners.

They had not walked far before a merry group about a blazing log fire attracted their attention; and as they neared it they could plainly distinguish the sound of violins mingled with the shouts and laughter of the soldiers. The officers came up unperceived; and, as they did so, Walter's heart sank within him as he beheld his father bare-headed, on a camp stool, gazing upwards at the stars, his head squeezed down into his shoulders, and whirling himself around in his seat, while his bow moved as if by steam. Not far from him was old Coon, mounted astride of one of the logs on the fire, his hat pulled over his eyes, and his head swung forward, while he swayed himself to and fro, droning in tune with his violin, and occasionally uttering a wild yell, as if pierced with ecstasy by the sounds which he was evoking.

The two friends, it seems, had met for the first time in many weeks; and from a dispute about the relative merits of Caswell and Lillington, had fallen into a more pleasant rivalry, and were now making a display of their musical skill, each playing a different tune, while Mons. Dufrong was endeavouring to dance to both. The crowd, hugely delighted, were divided in opinion; and with "Old Virginny, Never Tire!" "Go it, Old Too Late!" and such like sentences, cheered on their respective friends. Walter Tucker, mortified beyond expression, instantly formed his determination; he bade Alice Bladen and aristocratic society a mental farewell for ever, and resolved, with Utopia, to bury himself from the world. Having thus determined to cast away his pride, and forego his cherished aspirations, he felt as if a burden had been taken off him; though he could not refrain from an expression of regret at his father's unusual and unseemly conduct.

"Tut, man, if I was a fiddler, I'd be playing myself," said Lillington; "and won't we caper wildly when we get to Wilmington!"

"My father seems strangely affected," continued Walter; "he is not such a man as you would take him for, from this display."

"No doubt of it, no doubt of it," replied Caswell; "any one would be justified in playing the child on this occasion."

At this moment the officers were recognized; and Dan, certainly influenced by a spirit stronger than that of mere enthusiasm, rushed to embrace his commander, when he discovered Walter. For a few minutes his manner changed as he greeted his son, tenderly, but not rudely or boisterously; and then saying, "Never mind, Walter, never mind, boy, I shall not disgrace you," he gave himself up to the most extravagant demonstrations of joy.

The young man, although remarkable for filial piety, could not but wish his father in New Berne, or on his island of Roanoke; but as for Dan, to use his own emphatic language, he didn't "care a green persimmon for anybody or anything." Old Zip kept along with him in this race of folly; and Mons. Dufrong, out of friendship for his former guests, was particularly drunk all the time, and would have required at least half-a-dozen of interpreters to make himself understood. The senior Tucker looked on the war as now at an end; the ken of the philosophic islander extended far into the future, and the vision of a pure democracy was already floating before his intoxicated fancy. In a day or two, however, he and his friends, Coon and the Frenchman, left the camp; and although Walter had now abandoned all hopes of aristocratic promotion, he could not but feel relieved by the absence of his plebeian relations.

RICHARD HOOKER WILMER

[1816—1900]

WALTER C. WHITAKER

RICHARD HOOKER WILMER, second bishop of Alabama, was of the Maryland Wilmers, who came over in the Cavalier emigration of 1649-1659, and who lived on the Eastern Shore for more than one hundred and fifty years. Six generations bring the family down to Richard Hooker. The original head of the American branch and three of his descendants were named Simon; the other two were Lambert, the son of the first Simon, and William Holland, father of the Bishop.

William Holland Wilmer was the fifth son of Simon and Ann Ringgold Wilmer, and was born in 1782. He was ordained in 1808 by Bishop Claggett of Maryland, and sprang at once into prominence as a man of tireless energy, unusual intellectual attainments, and remarkable spirituality. Besides his efficiency as a rector, he was instrumental in restoring the professorship of theology in William and Mary College and in founding the Theological Seminary near Alexandria, Virginia.

In 1826 he became president of William and Mary College and rector of Bruton Parish, Williamsburg, did a marvelous work in a twelvemonth, and died. His ministry covered less than twenty years; he was young even at the end; yet he had been three times President of the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies of the General Convention, and had rehabilitated the Protestant Episcopal Church in Virginia.

Richard Hooker Wilmer was his third child by Marian Hannah Cox, his second wife. He was born March 15, 1816, and was left motherless at the age of five. His father soon married Anne Brice Fitzhugh, between whom and Richard the closest ties grew up. A few years later the father died, and at the age of twelve Richard was the oldest boy in a family of nine, with much of the family support dependent upon him.

In 1831, Mrs. Wilmer moved out from Alexandria to Seminary Hill and opened a high school on the present site of the Episcopal High School. Richard attended this school one year, and then, with the proceeds of a timely sale of land in Ohio, granted to a maternal ancestor by the Continental Congress, he went to Yale College, where he was graduated in 1836 at the age of twenty.

Returning from Yale to Virginia, he immediately entered the Theological Seminary and began his three years' course of preparation for holy orders—a career which, when his clerical antecedents are considered, was very natural. During his course of theological training, he lived with his stepmother, who had meanwhile closed her school and removed to Lebanon, a few miles distant; and his farmer-life interfered not a little with his student-life.

He had no difficulty, however, in passing his examinations, and on Easter Day, 1839, in Monumental Church, Richmond, he was made deacon by Bishop Moore, and the next day was advanced to the priesthood. Broad-shouldered and thick-chested from both inheritance and out-of-door life, he read the service in a voice that captivated his hearers with its mellowness and richness; and his elocution, always without the slightest artificiality, was even then well-nigh perfect.

His first charge was St. Paul's, Goochland County, and St. John's, Fluvanna County. His parishioners lived for fifty miles along the James River: all of them were hereditary members of the Protestant Episcopal Church, but there was not one male communicant in the entire flock. To be a Christian was to be "unmanly;" to abjure Christianity was to be "emancipated." Yet Wilmer took hold of the men of this region, and by his unaffected, red-blooded, uneviscerated manliness, won their respect, first for himself and then for his cause; and within the few years of his incumbency he had revolutionized social and religious conditions in that neighborhood. Shortly after assuming this work he married Margaret Brown at her father's estate, "Belmont," Nelson County, Virginia, October 6, 1840. On her mother's side, Mrs. Wilmer was of old Virginia stock, being a granddaughter of Robert Rives and Margaret Jordan Cabell. Her father was Alexander Brown, who came from Perth, Scotland, in 1811. Her gentle and retiring nature was an offset to her husband's masterfulness, and they were a well-matched pair. Much of his subsequent success was due to her quiet helpfulness and gentle care.

After a short rectorship in Wilmington, North Carolina, Wilmer accepted the rectorship of Grace Church, Berryville and Wickliffe Parish, in Clarke County, Virginia, and remained there from 1844 to 1849, as long a pastorate as he ever exercised in any one place. Here his effectiveness and reputation as a preacher grew steadily. Sermon work was favored by the bracing climate and encouraged by the good listening of his Scotch-Irish hearers. One sermon a week was all he would undertake, and in preparing this sermon he was thorough and definite. The first draft took the shape of a letter to one of his parishioners. From this draft he secured the tone of personal appeal that ever remained a chief charm of his preaching.

Then he developed his subject, carefully eschewing abstractions, but ever pressing on to drive home the chief thought of his discourse. His sermons defied conventional analysis; they were not put together of different independent pieces of thought, as is a wagon or an engine, but grew as an oak tree grows, and were spiritually massive, strong, and umbrageous. No little of his attractiveness in the pulpit was due to his freedom from cant and from Pharisaic stringency as to non-essentials. He was a masculine man, and he insisted on the weightier matters of the law. Often he gave offence because he did insist on urging the necessity of judgment, mercy, and truth, honesty, sobriety, and virtue—but he accepted with equanimity the outcome of fidelity to his commission. Alluding to his reputation as a preacher, Bishop Meade asked playfully, on one of his visitations, "Well, Brother Wilmer, how many have you preached into the Church this year?"

"I haven't preached anybody into the Church," was Wilmer's answer, "but I have preached one man out of it."

Then came a breakdown in his nervous structure which compelled him to drop all work for one year. When but partly restored, he went to Loudoun and Fauquier counties, where he spent an uneventful ministry of three years (1850-1853). In 1853 he removed to Forest, in Bedford County, and here he remained till 1858, when, in response to urgent solicitation from John Stewart, he took the country work at Brook Hill, near Richmond. Here he founded a parish that was soon lifting the practical heathenism of the surrounding poor into intelligent Christianity. John Stewart and his brother, Daniel, paid the expenses of the work and prayed for its prosperity, and to their prayers, more than to his own labors, did Wilmer attribute the fruit that came in such large measure. His life as rector of Emmanuel Church was that of a suburban pastor, having the advantages of proximity to a thriving city, yet with all the benefits of country freedom.

The success of his work and the attractiveness of his personality made him a prominent figure, and he was a deputy from Virginia to the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which met in Richmond in 1859. In the same year William and Mary College conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

In 1861, as the war of the secession became imminent, Wilmer was swept off his feet by his patriotism and conception of duty as a Virginian, and he became captain and drill-master of the home-guard raised in the neighborhood. He cooled off after a little, resigned his captaincy, and contented himself with ministering to the sick and wounded—save that, throughout the conflict, which he ever regarded as a war of defence by the South, he publicly and strenuously urged men to the tented field, taking as his warranty the command of the Lord to the priests of Israel to blow the silver trumpet summoning the tribes of the Lord to arms when the land was invaded.

On November 21, 1861, he was unanimously, and on the first ballot, elected Bishop of Alabama. The consecration took place in St. Paul's Church, Richmond, March 6, 1862, Bishop Meade presiding, and Bishops Johns and Elliott joining in the "laying on of hands." Ten days later the Bishop was at work in his new field.

An unsuccessful war and increasing impoverishment do not conduce to the building up of church organizations, and the first years of Wilmer's episcopate were confined to the work of holding the diocesan forces together so far as they could be held, to ministering to the women, children, and old men who remained at home, and to caring for the spiritual condition of the soldiers. Toward the close of the war an orphanage was undertaken on the Bishop's personal responsibility, and by his self-sacrifice was maintained without interruption, first at Tuskaloosa, then at Mobile. He attempted to establish a publishing house for the distribution of religious literature in the army; but, while many hundreds of prayer-books were distributed, the breaking of lines of communication by the Federal soldiers soon brought the scheme to naught.

About this time friends in Mobile presented to him a house and lot at Spring Hill, seven miles from the city, and, removing thither from his war-time residence in Greensboro, he began the development of a rural home whose restfulness and hospitality became known far and wide. Here he spent his leisure hours between visitations, till his death.

Of leisure there was at first but little, but the Bishop's work was confined chiefly in its administrative functions to the slowly developing work in the larger towns and cities, Mobile, Montgomery, Selma, and Huntsville (there was no Birmingham), and in its prophetic functions to the laying of doctrinal foundation and the determining of the theological tone of the diocese.

The Bishop's pulpit power was now at its height, and the sermons which he preached from 1868 to 1880 have seldom been excelled in theoretical excellence, in charm of style, spiritual depth, and immediate, far-reaching effect. Chief among these discourses were the sermon preached in Savannah at the consecration of Bishop Beckwith of Georgia, and his sermons on "Manliness" and "Covetousness." On ritual questions, which divided men into parties within the Church, and on doctrinal differences between his own Church and other Christian bodies, he had clear-cut views, and he let others know his position, but was rather eirenic than controversial in his preaching. His three pastoral letters on "Christian Charity," "The Church of God," and "Revivals," were misunderstood by those who forgot that they were official pronouncements for family government, and who were just those indifferent ones of whom the Bishop himself declared that they say "You are right, and I am right; and, though we hold contradictory views, both of us are right." Conscience, he held, might justify a man in holding a position which, nevertheless, was untenable; conscience could determine the man's position, but not the soundness of his position.

In 1887 the Bishop's one book was published: 'The Recent Past, from a Southern Standpoint.' A second edition appeared six months later; and other editions have appeared from time to time since. His opinions on national, religious, and ecclesiastical subjects were stated frankly and unconventionally; and eloquent tributes were paid to those men whose lives were linked most closely with his own. Two years later a portion of the book was published separately under the title 'Guide Marks for Young Churchmen.' In 1888 his most noted pastoral, "The Words of Christ," was published. This pastoral, in amplified form, he preached before the General Convention in Baltimore in 1892.

In consequence of his increasing infirmities, Bishop Wilmer consented, in 1890, to the election of a coadjutor; and on January 21, 1891, the Rev. Henry Melville Jackson, D.D., of Richmond, Virginia, was consecrated Bishop-coadjutor of Alabama. This assistance, relieving Bishop Wilmer's body from over-exertion and his mind from undue anxiety, left him free for the continued use of his pen. The concluding years were filled with letter-writing and with the publishing of tracts and pamphlets. For long periods he wrote eight hours a day, a letter rarely remaining unanswered twenty-four hours. Two sermons which he worked over and published attained a very large circulation. Of that on "The Efficacy of Prayer," ten thousand copies were distributed, and an edition of four thousand copies of "Confession of Sin Not Profession of Religion" was sold in a few months. These tracts, not being copyrighted, were republished in full in scores of religious and secular publications, and entered thousands of homes.

The failing health of the Coadjutor induced the Bishop to return for a time to the active visitation of the diocese; but this could not be for long. Upon the Coadjutor's resignation the Rev. Robert W. Barnwell of Selma was elected coadjutor; but before he could be consecrated, Bishop Wilmer passed away, June 14, 1900, aged eighty-four years and three months. His remains rest in Magnolia Cemetery, Mobile.

CITIZENSHIP

From 'The Recent Past.' Copyright, Thomas Whittaker, and used here by permission.

LET us look around about us. Perhaps I should begin more properly with the individual, and talk to you about the man, his body, soul, and spirit. If I live to complete this letter, I may, perhaps, touch all these several points. But just now I feel more disposed to treat and get rid of certain matters of a more general description, hoping that as I get nearer the end of life, and get more of the light that streams from the "Delectable Mountains," I may have more to tell you of that other country for which we are all bound, and on the confines of which I know that I am now standing. Of this, more anon. I want now to say something about your earthly citizenship. No man liveth to himself. He is a member of society, and under government. The books of history and geography which you may read will give you all that you need to know in a general way about the several continents and countries, etc. I let all that pass, only observing that histories, as a general rule, are one-sided, partisan, and partial, recording the facts from many various and conflicting standpoints, inso-much that we are often compelled, with Pilate, to exclaim, "What is truth?" To go into this matter (at any sufficient length to make it profitable), I find impracticable. Let it suffice for me to say this much: the history of one age is pretty much the history of all ages; that which hath been, is now, and until something, as yet unknown to history, shall intervene, will most likely continue to be; and there is, so far as human nature is concerned, "nothing new under the sun."

There is one matter about which I feel especially solicitous that you should be rightly informed; and that is, the political history of your own country, and section of country. We have passed through, during the last twenty-five years, a mighty revolution. That revolution effected a mighty change in the character of our government and institutions. It is most important for you to understand the merits of that conflict of ideas which convulsed the minds of the people, North and South, and finally culminated in a sectional war, which turned a million of men to ashes, and covered the whole land with mourning. Even at this present moment, as I write, we seem to walk on molten lava, whose surface is scarcely cooled. Your father, who is writing these lines, was deeply and passionately involved on the side of his State and section; ready, if his ministerial calling had not forbidden, to have shouldered his musket, and entered the fight. As it was, under a temporary access of passion, he became captain of a home-guard, and drilled daily, while yet rector of a church near Richmond, Virginia. I mention this to give you an idea of the intensity of the excitement. Your grand-uncle, the Rev. Lemuel Wilmer, who was, as he viewed it, an ardent patriot, wrote me after the war was over, that, when Maryland was invaded, he went to Washington with musket on his shoulder, and took his place in the trenches. He was then an old man, and had been rector of Port Tobacco Parish for half a century. I refer to this incident to show you that some of our blood still live up to the motto on the family coat-of-arms—“Facit quod suscipit.” A little reflection served to cool the heat of my fever and turned my attention to a more legitimate sphere of action. Besides, I read that the “Son of man”—whose servant I was—“came not to destroy men’s lives, but to save them;” and I read also, that “the servant must be as his lord.” While the war lasted, I did what I could for the wounded and the sick, and blew the trumpet to excite men to action in the field; taking as my warranty for doing this much, the permission given to the Jewish Priesthood, “to blow the silver trumpet in case of a war of invasion.” You will have read, and will continue to read, as they are published, many histories of that conflict. I do not wish to so bias your minds as that they shall not take a calmer, and perhaps clearer, view of that conflict of ideas and of arms that I, from my position, could be expected to do. Your own views on this matter will, and must, depend, in great measure, upon the description of books that you are likely to read. Owing to the fact that the North does most of the publishing of books—and especially of school-books—you will most likely at school be in a situation to imbibe Northern ideas of the origin, causes, etc., of the whole revolution; to hear many whose names have stood high for learning, character, and for all that makes up true nobility, characterized as “rebels,” “traitors,” and the like; and a great, though ineffectual, struggle for right and compact denounced as "The Great Rebellion." Well, if all this was as our enemies allege, I have no wish to so forestall your minds with opinions to the contrary as to close them to the entrance of the truth. For truth, like the King's messenger, has authority to enter the mind and the heart "in the name of the King." Our only privilege is, to inquire whether it is the King's messenger. To guide you in such an inquiry, and to dictate not at all, is the object of this writing.

INTRUSION OF THE MILITARY POWER

From 'The Recent Past.'

JUST after the Civil War, which reduced the State of Alabama to the condition of a military province, your grandfather became the object of a military order which closed the churches of his diocese, and subjected him to a notoriety which he neither desired nor anticipated. It is a long story, with which I will not burden these pages. You will find in the journals of my diocese a very full statement of the whole matter. You will also find a brief synoptical view in the "Centennial History of the Church in America." Let it suffice for me to say, that even at this hour, as I stand upon the border of time, there is not a word put down in the history of those events which I regret or would recall. I have in this matter the answer of a good conscience towards God and man.

I give you here the briefest outline. When the war ended, I found the civil government of the State subverted, her constitution abrogated, her governor deposed, and held under duress, her whole civil power annihilated, the drumhead the only tribunal of justice.

The first practical question that pressed upon me for decision was that relating to the use of the "Prayer for all those in Civil Authority," as formulated in the Book of Common Prayer. I looked around, and found no vestige of any such authority. I was under no ecclesiastical obligation to use the prayer as it stood in the prayerbook; for when I was consecrated a bishop, I had made a "Declaration of Conformity" to the Constitution of the Church in the Confederate States.

Some of the generals in the Federal Army were kind enough to step forward, and attempt to solve all my doubts upon the question; but they did not succeed in settling my difficulty. Prayer ought to be a very real and sincere thing; and I could not find it in my heart to send up a prayer to Heaven for a blessing on what had no existence, nor could I make up my mind to pray under dictation. But I was bound by a higher obligation than any which man can impose, to pray for our rulers of whatever sort. The fact that they were holding us in slavish subjection did not release us from that obligation. Nor did we desire any such release. The fact that they had abrogated all the sanctions of our former legislative, judicial, and executive government, only increased the necessity for more earnest prayers unto God that He would give grace to these soldiers who held us under the bayonet, to "execute justice, and maintain truth." But when it came to ask the Almighty to give "health, prosperity, and long life" to the commander-in-chief of this body of men, who had settled down upon our whole country, and when officers with swords at their sides came to demand it, I, for one, had no doubt or misgiving as to what course I should pursue. I wish that some of my brethren who will not consent to catholicize our prayers—the prayer for the President is the one uncatholic spot in our regular liturgy—could have seen the necessity as I then saw it. The wording of this prayer will have to be changed. The troubles in this country have not ended. We will have to go through all the diseases incident to a nation's childhood. We will have—we have already nearly had—rival Presidents-elect. It may be we shall have a President of Knights of Labor, with men of brawn and muscle to make good their pretensions. Then will come the strain; then timid people will palter with the Almighty in a double sense; then feeble brethren, at the nod of a soldier, will wing heavenward their extorted little prayers (which are insults to heaven), with protests attached to them. I have known that to be done, and it may happen again.

He studies history to little purpose who does not now provide for all the contingencies likely to arise in the course of events. What endless troubles came upon the people of England during the usurpation of Cromwell. The loyal men of the realm felt bound in conscience to pray for the king; and the powers that were forbade it, and sent the offenders to prison or into exile. A state of things may exist in this country, when a rude soldier shall step up to the officiating minister, and demand to know which President of the United States he refers to in his prayer; and it may even happen that one clergyman may be praying in one church for one President, and another in a neighboring church may be invoking long life and prosperity upon another claimant to the office. He has read history very superficially who does not recognize the possibility of all that I have supposed.

Situated as I was after the war of the States, with no existing civil authority over me, I was virtually ordered to "pray for the dead" with but slight hope of any present resurrection. They who mean nothing by their prayers can easily pray for any thing or nothing. "Why do you curse so?" said an acquaintance, "you offend me by your profanity." "Ah, well!" was the reply, "you pray a good deal, and I curse a good deal, but the Lord knows that neither of us means anything by it."

But this is aside. In the state of things above described, I issued a pastoral letter to my clergy, and told them that "the prayer for all those in civil authority" was out of place and utterly incongruous under the present state of affairs; that, whilst bound over to pray for our rulers, there was a manifest incongruity in the prayer-book form of prayer for rulers which made it inapplicable to our people in their then condition; that it was not a question of loyalty, but of congruity, and a question to be settled by none but an ecclesiastical authority. The clergy fell into line to a man.

Hearing that there were troubles brewing in Mobile—I had refuged in Greensborough—I went there at once. I had been in the city but a few hours when a servant came to my room, and told me that an officer had called to see me. Upon going to the parlor, a general of the Federal army introduced himself to me as an officer on the staff of the General commanding, and said that he had called by direction of said officer, to know when I meant to use the prayer for the President of the United States. I told him that that was a question the General had no right to ask, and that I answered no such questions if put in a tone of authority; that the Church had her sphere of action, and could not permit any intrusion. The officer was thrown aback, talked a good deal about the absoluteness of military power, and intimated not obscurely, that I would have to succumb. I told him that he would see for himself the issue. After a considerable talk on his part—I preserving entire silence—he proposed that we should talk the matter over as “between man and man.” I told him that I had no sentiment that was not open to the world, but none that could be extorted. He then in a very familiar way put the question anew under the programme of, as “between man and man.”—“When do you think you will use the prayer-book prayer for the President?”

I answered, “When you all get away from here.” This particular prayer was for a government of the people’s choice and affection—the loyal prayer of the Church of England, rather servilely continued in our liturgy. “The fact is, sir, that the government, as it is over us now, and impersonated in the President is a government for which I desire the least ‘length of life’ and the ‘least prosperity’ that is consistent with the permissive will of God”; that we did ardently pray that he who held these reins of absolute power might have “grace” to execute judgment, and to maintain truth, etc., and hoped that our prayers would be answered. I then said to the officer, “Suppose our positions reversed; suppose we had conquered you, and, amid all your desolation and sadness and humiliation, commanded you to fall down upon your knees, and ask God to grant long life, health, and prosperity to our commanding officer—would you do it?” I cannot quote his reply, for his excitement threw him off his balance; and he intimated in strong but profane terms, that he would be—something very dreadful—if he would. “Well,” I said, “I am not disposed to use your phraseology; but, if I do that thing that you come to order me to do—addressing the Almighty with my lips when my heart is not in my prayer—I run great danger of meeting the doom that you have hypothetically invoked upon your own head.” He then left.

In the course of a few days, there came out “general orders” shutting up all our churches, and “suspending” me from all my functions. These orders were, on the part of the general commanding the military district, accompanied with a shower of bad language that could only fall with its foul savor on the head of him who gave vent to it.

Meanwhile, the churches were nearly all closed, and soldiers stationed at the doors to prevent entrance. Yet it is a great mercy that even military rule cannot entirely close our communications with Heaven. We worshipped in private houses; and I confirmed in churches which were not guarded by soldiers, issued Pastorals, etc., much to the indignation of the general who had suspended me from my functions.

After a while, the Council of the Church in the Confederate States held its regular triennial session at Augusta, Ga. There the whole question of "the prayer of those in authority" was settled by the adoption of the old form in the Prayer-Book. Coupled with this action, however, was a "resolution" that each bishop should exercise his own discretion as to the time for its introduction. Upon this modification, I had absolutely insisted.

By this action of the Council it was competent for me at once to order the use of the prayer; but as the military intrusion still existed, I delayed the matter until the order should be withdrawn. It went hard with the General to do it; but he was compelled by a higher power, and poured out his wrath in language that could only defile the lips from which it issued.

If I cannot say with the Apostle, "I have after the manner of men, fought with beasts at Ephesus," I can truly say that there was poured upon my head a very flood of abuse and obloquy. I received it in all complacency. I do not know whether I most enjoy the plaudits of my friends or the abuse of my unfriends. It is grateful "laudari a laudato viro." The abuse of some men is a crown of glory.

Now, I have made a long story very short. The whole narration might prove wearisome.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN

From 'The Recent Past.'

THERE was a book, written by Mrs. Stowe—a sister of the celebrated Henry Ward Beecher—which had an immense circulation, and exerted a powerful influence. It was a work of fiction, entitled 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.' It was written with considerable ability, and was, in some respects, a most attractive and thrilling narrative. It collected together many incidents illustrative of the cruelty with which slaves were said to be treated in the South. They may have been true, or not true. You can find similar incidents in all the relations of life, in all ages, and among all people. Yet—strange to say—the book, if carefully analyzed, speaks volumes in favor of that which it was written to condemn. It was, essentially, a specimen of feminine logic; but let me explain. Shortly after the war I was in New York, and met with an old acquaintance. The conversation turned upon domestic slavery. I asked him how it was that the Northern mind had become so thoroughly abolitionized; telling him, that when I was a youth, pursuing my studies at old Yale, the abolitionists were few in number, and not of much social standing. He replied, that, in his judgment, 'Uncle Tom's Cabin'—the book above referred to—had as much to do with the growth of a bitter feeling against slavery as any other agency, and asked me if I had ever read the book. "Of course I have," said I: "we all read it, and in some respects admire it—chiefly, its powers as a work of fiction. If it pretends to describe slavery as it generally existed, it is pretty much a work of falsehood." "But yet," I continued to say, "very few have ever pondered that book, and extracted its truest and deepest meaning."—"As how?" said he. "In this way," I answered. "Tell me who was the most striking character in that book for honesty, fidelity, and piety?"—Why, 'Uncle Tom,' of course," he said—"one of the finest characters I ever read of!"—"Yes," I said, "he was; but who was Uncle Tom? Was he not a slave? and does not the book go to show, that, if you want to find the best specimen of honesty and piety among servants, you must seek him among the slaves. Africa did not produce him, does not now produce him. We think that domestic slavery tended to the production of just such a character; fostering the instinct of obedience, from which spring reverence and faith. Be this as it may, I can say this much without contradiction—that, according to Mrs. Stowe's book, slavery is not incompatible with the highest development of honesty and piety in the slave." He pondered my remark for a moment, and said, "Of course, I must admit that much; it is so written in the book."—"Well, again," said I, "who was the most attractive character in the book?"—"Eva," he said, "one of the most lovely of her sex, gentle and refined—a beautiful character indeed."—"Who was Eva? was she not a slaveholder?"—"Yes, she was."—"Then," I replied, "in so far forth as that book is concerned, if you want to find a specimen of a peculiarly gentle and refined young woman" (Eva was the young lady of the house in which Uncle Tom served), "you must seek for her among slaveholders. We have an idea that the relation between those two parties—the young mistress and the old servant—tended naturally to the production of the qualities described in them both. At any rate, you must admit, that, according to Mrs. Stowe, refinement in the woman is not incompatible with the position of ownership in slaves."—"Yes," he said, "I cannot but admit that much; it is so set down in Mrs. Stowe's book."—"And now, once more," I continued, "who was the worst character in the book?"—"Why, Legree," he answered—"a vile and cruel man."—"Who was Legree? was he not a Northern man who came South, trafficked in slaves, and maltreated them?"—"That is all so," he answered. I then wound up the conversation by saying to my friend, "Then, the gist of the book is this: if you want a good, honest, and religious servant, seek him among the slaves—find an Uncle Tom; if you want to see a glorious specimen of womanly loveliness, seek her among the slaveholders—find an Eva: and keep every Down-Easter from having any power over the poor creatures. Mrs. Stowe's book must be held responsible for this conclusion." A profound silence ensued, and a profound silence should reign for a while among the chatterers on this subject. For all that was beautiful in that condition of society has passed away. And there was something beautiful in the relation between the parties—especially in the care taken of the young and the old.

Beautiful and just and benignant was the patriarchal condition of slavery in the "Old Dominion." All gone, or going—the honest and loving-hearted Uncle Tom, the lovable Eva; fast going—the faithful old mammy, the decent and comely maid-servant, reverence, obedience, faithful service, and Uncle Tom piety—all vanishing into space; and what have we instead? Conflicts of races, animosity and distrust, jealousy of capital, suffrage without sense, religion without morals, service without reverence—Gog and Magog—the old war between oppressive capital and discontented labor—he that runs may read! I say this, without fear of just contradiction, that slavery, as it existed in my time, in the State of Virginia—I say Virginia, for I was born and reared in that State—presented the justest and fairest condition of society that I have ever seen or read of. The same was true, I doubt not, in other Southern States. Compare the condition of the slave laborer with that of any class of people in similar employment in other lands. Read of the condition of the manufacturing and laboring classes anywhere. The condition of the slave in the Old Dominion showed a larger remuneration for labor, and a kinder treatment, with a comfortable provision for old age. Alas! poor old black man now! I think I can say, with entire truth, that the large majority of slaves at Christmas Eve were well housed, well fed, well clothed, with something extra in the pocket. There were exceptions, of course, but inappreciable in a large view. Where is the parallel, in any country, among white laborers of same condition?

But when the issues of the war emancipated the black, and Republicanism clothed him with the rights of American citizenship, including that of suffrage, the South handed over to the country millions of people of African descent, prepared, in the judgment of a majority of the people of this country, to exercise the duties and enjoy the privileges of said citizenship. These were the "down-trodden slaves," so-called! What Christian mission has ever accomplished the same result on the coast of Africa? How is it with the Indians? If there be any truth in the coming histories of this country, such facts as these will not long be silent, but will speak in tones most eloquent of the benignant and civilizing power of domestic slavery. My heart warms even now as I recall the past, and there come up before me the memories of my childhood and early manhood; of the dear old mammy who took me into her arms, and made me sit in her lap, and eat of the buttermilk and the ash cake with apples in it, which with loving hands she had made ready for "young master" when he came back from college. You, my children, who shall spend your lives in the Southern States, and shall take part in the effort to adjust the social and domestic life to this new order of things, will some day, I fear, be forced to appreciate what I have said of the past, and anticipate for the future. As yet, while I write these lines, we have some few of the old folks left. They have all of our love and respect. These have not yet learned to look distrustfully upon the friends of their childhood. Fond memories still bind them to their white friends. As to the young fry, who are not taught reverence and subordination, what is their destiny? I shudder to think of it. I hope that I may be mistaken. God knows that I am doing all in my power to avert the impending danger. But what can you hope for in the large, from a people, who, by their own confession, know little of the virtues of chastity and honesty? Would they come under the influence of a religion which makes "things which are true," "things which are honest," "things which are just," the foundation of their religious character, then we might hope to see a superstructure of "those things which are lovely and of good report."

But, alas! thrown off to themselves—especially in our rural districts, where they outnumber the whites—their religion oft becomes a caricature, not far short of the Fetichism of their native Africa.

The Church could help them, and is now putting forth more energy on their behalf; but alas! they cling to their own devices, and will have none of her ways.

We read and hear—usque ad nauseam—of the brutalizing and debasing effect of slavery upon the character of this people. All their degradation is referred to this relationship. Orators and pamphleteers expatiate upon the theme, until some people actually begin to believe there is something in it. But whence and when, and through what period of time, came their present comparative advancement? It was not in Africa, nor from Africa, that the influence came which elevated him from the savage state. The white man goes to Africa, and has to write out a language for the natives. As a people, they have little inventive power. They seem to make slow, if any, advancement in their native land. Even under civilizing influence in their own country, they develop slowly and doubtfully. Yet, under the auspices of servitude in the Southern States, millions have been raised to American citizenship, which is denied to the ever-free Indian. If they were not fitted for it, what a shame to have given them power to dominate the white race, as they did in some localities! If they were so fitted, what a tribute to the elevated influences of Southern slavery!

And their citizenship was accomplished by a vote of a majority of the people of the United States!

I say nothing in vindication of slavery in its origin. It was a foul wrong, shared alike by North and South, and to be repented of by both sections with works meet for repentance. It was a foul wrong to sell Joseph into Egypt, and afterwards to enslave his descendents there. Yet out of this wrong the wonder-working providence of God wrought good unto Israel. So may it be in the case of Africa in America! I say nothing regretfully of the fact—not the manner—of the negro's emancipation. I am doing, as I have always done, all in my power to help him in every manner. I am alike a debtor to the bond and the free. But I do maintain, and that without fear of reasonable contradiction, that the negro's present civilized condition and capability is due to this cause—that he was brought closely into relations with the white men—and the best white men—in his state of servitude. The closer the relation—as in the family—the more marked the advancement! Here is a fact which should be deeply pondered by those who love and seek the truth; viz., that the slaveholding population of the Southern States were, for the most part, men of standing and culture, imbued oftentimes with a chivalry of spirit which forbade unkindness to the slave who lived under his roof, who ate of his bread, and hearkened unto his voice. A true Southern man will not be unjust to his dog.

AUGUSTA EVANS WILSON

AUGUSTA EVANS WILSON

[1835—1909]

LOUISE MANLY

TO Augusta Evans Wilson belongs the rare distinction of a literary activity of fifty years, with no diminution but even an increase of power and skill in her latest works. She was born May 8, 1835, in Columbus, Georgia. From her parents she inherited great gifts, intellect, refinement, and a lovely disposition, her mother, Sarah Howard, a member of one of Georgia's most distinguished families, being universally beloved. As a child and young girl, Augusta Evans was delicate; and, unable to bear the confinement of school, she was taught by her mother, who wisely led her inclination for omnivorous reading into safe and healthful paths.

In 1845 Mr. Evans removed to Texas, and for four years resided at San Antonio. This was near the close of the Mexican War; and the stirring events of that period made a deep impression upon the receptive mind of the child, whose strong and vivid imagination seized its varied pictures and reproduced them in the first work of her pen, 'Inez: a Tale of the Alamo.' It was written in Mobile, where her father, returning east in 1849, had settled, and was presented to him as a Christmas gift by his fifteen-year-old daughter. Harper and Brothers published it in 1855.

Four years of reading and study developed her second novel, 'Beulah,' of which she says: " 'Beulah' reflects to some extent the struggle between doubt and faith through which I passed in early life; and although many philosophic problems remain unsolved, my belief in the religion taught by Jesus Christ is implicit and unalterable."

Miss Evans went herself to New York to negotiate for the publication of 'Beulah.' She applied to Mr. J. C. Derby, of Derby and Jackson, telling him frankly that 'Inez' had not sold well, and that the Appletons had refused this new novel, adding, "I was dissatisfied with the first and was not discouraged by its reception. I believe, however, that I now have written something that will be read if I can find a publisher for it."

Mr. Derby submitted the manuscript to his own family, who approved it unanimously; and it was brought out in 1859. Its success was immediate and extraordinary, setting its author as "a new star suddenly appearing in American literature." Among the first orders was one for one thousand copies from the firm which had refused it.

The clouds that had long been gathering now burst over the country in the tragic war between the States. The heart and sympathies of Augusta Evans were naturally with her people. In her own words: "The sole enthusiasm of my life was born, lived, and perished in the eventful four years of the Confederacy. Those solemn, anxious, torturing, yet holy, four years of tears, prayers, vigils beside hospital cots, of nights passed on my knees in prayer for dear ones in battle line; those few vivid, terrible years constitute for me the most sacredly sacrificial portion of my life."

Her genius evolved from these trying times its third work, 'Macaria: or, Altars of Sacrifice.' It was published at Richmond, Virginia, 1863, by West and Johnson, bearing the copyright of "The Confederate States of America," and was printed on coarse yellow paper, the best that could then be procured in the South. Dedicated "To the Brave Soldiers of the Southern Army," it was of course widely read among them; and at a terrible battle in Virginia a copy of it saved the life of a soldier. Being suddenly called into action while reading it, he thrust it into his breast pocket. When the battle was over, a bullet, which unarrested would have entered his heart, was found embedded in its leaves.

Despite a rigid blockade and the vigilance of Federal officers, who burned as "contraband and dangerous" all copies they could secure, 'Macaria' was carried to New York and was about to be published by parties who intended to "confiscate rebel property" and pay nothing for copyright. But Miss Evans had sent, by a blockade runner, a copy of the book to Mr. Derby, who at once made arrangements to issue it. Hearing, however, of the scheme above mentioned, he arranged that a royalty should be paid; so that when the war was over, he held in trust a handsome sum for the author; and to her delight and grateful surprise, when she went again to New York with the manuscript of 'St. Elmo,' she found this godsend in the hands of her loyal friend. To him she dedicated the new book, "in grateful memory of many years of kind and faithful friendship."

'St. Elmo,' "the most praised, best abused novel ever written," came out in 1866 from the press of G. W. Carleton, who with his successors, the G. W. Dillingham Company, thenceforward published all her books. Its success was immediate and widespread. Near Chattanooga stands now a village called St. Elmo; and other towns, as well as hotels, steamboats, and country-seats, were named in its honor. It is, without doubt, the best known and most popular of all her novels, the publishers issuing it alone in a magnificent édition de luxe.

A striking fact about 'St. Elmo' is that, though written just after the war, it has not a word, not an echo of that strenuous and troubled era. With rare self-control and a sense born of high wisdom, she lifts herself and her readers out of the overwhelming seas around them and places them in a region of peace and prosperity, to which only the most sanguine hope then beckoned the stricken inhabitants of the South.

The returns from her books now accomplished the darling desire of her heart, which was to free her father from the burdens of care and financial embarrassment that war had laid upon him, in common with all fathers of the South.

On December 2, 1868, Miss Evans was married to Colonel L. M. Wilson, an honored and prominent citizen of Mobile. At their beautiful suburban residence, "Ashland," about three miles west of the city, our author's love of home, flowers, and country life found full scope for activity and enjoyment. The place consisted of forty acres, with a white dwelling of spacious rooms, and broad halls and galleries. Around the house were hot-houses and gardens where, under Mrs. Wilson's personal care, flourished, in great beauty and profusion, azaleas, camellia japonicas, geraniums, begonias, roses, ferns, and other plants, native and exotic. Handsome trees shaded the wide grounds, and beyond were seen flocks of milk-white poultry and still further the orchards, pastures, and fields, where Colonel Wilson indulged his fancy for fine stock.

Mrs. Wilson's mornings were given to housekeeping and her flowers; then came correspondence, reading, and study, until three o'clock in the afternoon, when Colonel Wilson came home from his city office and her desk was closed for the day. Once a week the house was thrown open to friends and guests. Mrs. Wilson was simple and unaffected in her conversation; it did not soar above the heads of her guests as might be suspected from the learning displayed in her novels; and she was as much interested in the simple topics of every-day life as in philosophy, science, literature, or politics.

'Vashti; or, Until Death Us Do Part,' was published in 1869, with the inscription, "To the Honored Memory of my Beloved Father, whose death has retarded the completion of a work which, in the beginning, was blessed with his approval, I reverently dedicate this book."

At her husband's request, Mrs. Wilson now rested for some years from arduous literary labors; and it was not until 1875 that 'Infelice' appeared, dedicated to her husband and her mother. Twelve years later came 'At the Mercy of Tiberius,' which she considered her best work.

It was always her custom to study thoroughly every subject that she introduced into her books; and in the case of this novel she investigated for several years the subject of electricity and collected eight well-authenticated accounts of electric photography, among them four instances of human faces photographed by lightning on window panes, which she uses with such telling effect.

She always had her plot completely in mind before beginning to write, so that she could write the last chapter as readily as the first; she revised frequently, working carefully and slowly, and her finished manuscript was free from erasure and correction.

In 1891 Mrs. Wilson lost her husband, after an ideally happy married life of twenty-three years. Grief and loneliness were accentuated by ill-health; and she gave up the lovely country home and bought a house on Government Street in Mobile, near her sister and also adjacent to Colonel Wilson's grandchildren. There, with her devoted brother, Mr. John Howard Evans, she resided in comparative seclusion, her main outside activity being in the field of charity.

To the astonishment of the reading world, after a silence of fifteen years, at a period of life when most minds have lost creative vigor, and when calm and ease have settled upon seething ambition—especially after accomplishments which seemed "enough for life and for glory"—Mrs. Wilson produced, in 1902, another work entitled 'A Speckled Bird,' with the graceful dedication, "To my kind readers, known and unknown, who have desired and asked me to write again, these pages are offered in grateful recognition of very loyal friendship during many years."

In this novel our author ventures for the first time since 'Macaria,' into the field of the actual, and places her heroine of both Northern and Southern blood, in the period following the war between the States, well epitomizing her position in social life by the title taken from a verse in Jeremiah: "As a speckled bird, the birds round about are against her."

Five years later came a novelette, 'Devota,' dedicated to her brother, John Howard Evans; though of only one hundred and twenty-two short pages, it is a crystal ball ensphering the many-sided and multi-colored life of to-day.

What is it in Mrs. Wilson's works that has caused them to outlive the years and the changes of taste in the almost two generations since she began writing? It is usually said to be her sincerity of purpose, the high moral tone of her novels, and their lessons against certain prevalent evils. All this is eminently true; but the same may be said of other writers of the last half-century whose works do not command the high regard in which Mrs. Wilson's novels stand.

Perhaps their first excellence, besides those already mentioned, is the great amount of work shown in them. An immense range of reading is evident, and an accurate if not profound study of many recondite subjects of both ancient and modern times. History, geography, belles-lettres, philosophy, the mythology and religion of all countries, politics, abuses in church and society, questions of the day—such as the craze of æstheticism, spiritualism, Buddhism, Theosophy, woman's suffrage, socialism, polar exploration—all are invoked to render tribute to her genius. Such learning has its charm for the scholar and its incentive to study for the young and unlearned. It is easy to cry "pedant"; but our author has no desire merely to display erudition; her viewpoint is well given in 'St. Elmo.' And this exuberance of learning is toned down in her later works. Especially in the matter of quotations is there a noticeable change, showing that she has kept in sympathy with the literary tastes of the passing years.

Another important gift is a strong and effective style. It is not sketchy, mere outlines and crude suggestions; it gives the complete glowing picture for those who cannot paint themselves.

The figures, though sometimes far-fetched, are invariably true to high and noble spiritual realities, as witness, this from a much-derided passage in 'St. Elmo.'

"St. Elmo.—Life is but a huge, mellow, golden Osher that mockingly sifts its bitter dust upon our eager lips. Ah! truly, on trouve au fond de tout le vide et le néant!

"Edna.—Mr. Murray, if you insist upon your bitter Osher simile, why shut your eyes to the palpable analogy suggested? Naturalists assert that the Solanum, or apple of Sodom, contains in its normal state neither dust nor ashes, unless it is punctured by an insect (the Tenthredo), which converts the whole of the inside into dust, leaving nothing but the rind entire, without any loss of color. Human life is as fair and tempting as the fruit of "Ain Jidy," till stung and poisoned by the Tenthredo of sin."

A sincere love and keen observation of nature are shown in her descriptions of its varied forms—the seasons, the sky, the flowers, the birds, the waters, whether of babbling brook or mighty ocean. They are, to the nature-lover, delightfully accurate.

A third and the greatest excellence—that without which all writers must fail—is the faculty of seizing into life, to use the figure of Goethe. Her characters are human, the scenes and events, the sorrows and joys are such as may be seen and felt in real life. Even the learned, self-willed young heroine, wise beyond her years, often criticized as unnatural and absurd, is found in real life. The type was more striking twenty-five years ago than now, since women's colleges and clubs have put the shibboleth of learning upon all women's lips.

Pervading all her works is Mrs. Wilson's noble sincerity. She teaches the root-truths, the eternal truths, which persist through all the changing forms of life and society, and which must be impressed again and again on each rising generation. Her whole thought and learning are pressed fearlessly into service to render virtue attractive and vice disgusting. In her own words, she has never drifted with popular currents of opinion, but, on the contrary, has fought her way upstream to what she considered sources of truth, regardless of adverse criticism; and she tasted her exceeding great reward in the knowledge of the good her works have accomplished. Letters came to her from many lands, telling of the interest and admiration her works excited, of souls reclaimed from vice and infidelity, and notably of the young incited to higher ideals and ambitions.

What more can the greatest genius do?

Mrs. Wilson died, at her Southern home, in May, 1909.

STRUGGLE BETWEEN DOUBT AND FAITH

From 'Beulah.' Copyright, G. W. Dillingham Company, and used here by permission of the publishers.

. . . HE looked at her searchingly, and observing unshed tears in her eyes said in a kinder tone than he had yet employed:

"Beulah, what do you want?"

"Something that I almost despair of obtaining."

"Child, you are wasting your strength and energies in a fruitless undertaking. Already you have grown thin and hollow-eyed; your accustomed contented, cheerful spirit, is deserting you. Your self-appointed task is a hopeless one; utterly hopeless!"

"I will not believe it," said she, firmly.

"Very well; some day you will be convinced that you are not infallible." He smiled grimly, and busied himself with his flowers.

"Sir, you could help me, if you would." She clasped her hands over his arm, and fixed her eyes on his countenance, with all the confidence and dependence of other days.

"Did I ever refuse you anything you asked?" said he, looking down at the little hands on his arm, and at the pale, anxious face, with its deep troubled eyes.

"No! and it is precisely for that reason that I ask assistance from you now."

"I suppose you are reduced to the last necessity. What has become of your pride, Beulah?"

"It is all here, in my heart, sir, thundering to me to walk out and leave you, since you are so unlike yourself." He looked stern, and indescribably sad. She glanced up an instant at his fascinating eyes, and then laying her head down on his arm, as she used to do in childhood, said resolutely:

"Oh, sir! you must aid me. Whom have I to advise me but you?"

"My advice has about as much weight with you as Charon's would, could he utter it. I am an admirable counsellor, only so long as my opinions harmonize with the dictates of your own will. How am I to aid you? I went, at twelve o'clock last night, to see a dying man, and passing along the street, saw a light burning from your window. Two hours later, as I returned, it glimmered there still. Why were you up? Beulah, what is the matter with you? Has your last treatise on the 'Origin of Ideas' run away with those of its author, and landed you both in a region of vagaries? Remember, I warned you."

"Something worse, sir."

"Perhaps German metaphysics have stranded you on the bleak, bald cliffs of Pyrrhonism?"

"Sir, it seems to me there is a great deal of unmerited odium laid upon the innocent shoulders of German metaphysics. People declaim against the science metaphysics, as if it were the disease itself, whereas it is the remedy. Metaphysics do not originate the trouble; their very existence proves the priority of the disease which they attempt to relieve——"

"Decidedly a homeopathic remedy," interrupted her guardian, smiling.

"But, sir, the questions which disturb my mind are older than my acquaintance with so-called philosophic works. They have troubled me from childhood."

"Nevertheless, I warned you not to explore my library," said he, with a touch of sorrow in his voice.

"How, then, can you habitually read books which you are unwilling to put into my hands?"

"To me all creeds and systems are alike null. With you, Beulah, it was once very different."

"Once! yes, once!" She shuddered at the wild waste into which she had strayed.

"What are the questions that have so long disturbed you?"

"Questions, sir, which all my life, have been printed on evening sun-flushed clouds, on rosy sea shells, on pale, sweet, delicate blossoms, and which I have unavailingly sought to answer for myself. There are mysteries in physics, morals and metaphysics, that have wooed me on to an investigation; but the further I wander, deeper grows the darkness. Alone, and unaided, I have been forced to brave these doubts; I have studied, and read and thought. Cloudy symbolisms mock me on every side; and the more earnestly I strive to overtake truth, the tighter grow my gyves. Now, sir, you are much older; you have scaled the dizzy heights of science, and carefully explored the mines of philosophy; and if human learning will avail, then you can help me. It is impossible for you to have lived and studied so long without arriving at some conclusion relative to these vexing questions of this and every other age. I want to know whether I have ever lived before; whether there is not an anterior life of my soul, of which I get occasional glimpses, and the memory of which haunts and disquiets me. This doubt has not been engendered by casual allusions to Plato's reminiscence theory; before I knew there was such a doctrine in existence, I have sat by your study fire, pondering some strange coincidences, for which I could not account. It seemed an indistinct outgoing into the far past; a dim recollection of scenes and ideas, older than the aggregate of my birth-days; now a flickering light, then all darkness; no clew; all shrouded in the mystery of voiceless ages. I tried to explain these psychological phenomena by the theory of association of ideas, but they eluded an analysis; there was no chain along which memory could pass. They were like ignes fatui, flashing up from dank caverns, and dying out while I looked upon them. As I grew older, I found strange confirmation in those curious passages of Coleridge and Wordsworth, and continually I propound to my soul these questions: If you are immortal, and will exist through endless ages, have you not existed from the beginning of time? Immortality knows neither commencement nor ending. If so, whither shall I go, when this material framework is dissolved to make other frame-works, to a final rest? or shall the I, the me, the soul, lose its former identity? Am I a minute constituent of the all-diffused, all-pervading Spirit, a breath of the Infinite Essence one day to be divested of my individuality? or is God an awful, gigantic, immutable, isolated Personality? If so, what medium of communication is afforded? Can the spiritual commune with matter? Can the material take cognizance of the purely spiritual and divine? Oh, sir! I know that you do not accept the holy men of Galilee as His deputed oracles. Tell me where you find surer prophets! Only show me the truth—the eternal truth, and I would give my life for it! Sir, how can you smile at such questions as these; questions involving the soul's destiny? One might fancy you a second Parrhasius."

She drew back a step or two, and regarded him anxiously, nay pleadingly, as though he held the key to the Temple of Truth, and would not suffer her to pass the portal. A sarcastic smile lighted his cold face, as he answered:

"There is more truth in your metaphor than you imagined; à la Parrhasius, I do see you, a tortured Prometheus, chained by links of your own forging to the Caucasus of Atheism. But listen to——"

"No, no; not that! not Atheism! God save me from that deepest, blackest gulf!" She shuddered, and covered her face with her hands.

"Beulah, you alone must settle these questions with your own soul; my solutions would not satisfy you. For thousands of years they have been propounded, and yet no answer comes down on the 'cloudy wings of centuries.' Each must solve to suit his or her peculiar conformation of mind. My child, if I could aid you, I would gladly do so; but I am no Swedenborg, to whom the arcana of the universe have been revealed."

"Still, after a fashion, you have solved these problems; may I not know what your faith is?" said she, earnestly.

"Child, I have no faith! I know that I exist; that a beautiful universe surrounds me, and I am conscious of a multitude of conflicting emotions; but, like Launcelot Smith, I doubt whether I am to 'pick and choose myself out of myself.' Further than this, I would assure you of nothing. I stand on the everlasting basis of all skepticism, 'there is no criterion of truth,' all must be but subjectively, relatively true."

TEACHER AND PUPIL

From 'St. Elmo.' Copyright, G. W. Dillingham Company, and used here by permission of the publishers.

. . . DRAWING Edna to a seat beside him on the sofa, Mr. Hammond said:

"Mrs. Murray has intrusted your education entirely to me; but before I decide positively what books you will require I should like to know what particular branches of study you love best. Do you feel disposed to take up Latin?"

"Yes, sir—and—"

"Well, go on, my dear. Do not hesitate to speak freely."

"If you please, sir, I should like to study Greek also."

"Oh, nonsense, Edna! women never have any use for Greek; it would only be a waste of your time," interrupted Mrs. Murray.

Mr. Hammond smiled and shook his head.

"Why do you wish to study Greek? You will scarcely be called upon to teach it."

"I should not think that I was well or thoroughly educated if I did not understand Greek and Latin; and besides I want to read what Solon and Pericles and Demosthenes wrote in their own language."

"Why, what do you know about those men?"

"Only what Plutarch says."

"What kind of books do you read with most pleasure?"

"History and travels."

"Are you fond of arithmetic?"

"No, sir."

"But as a teacher you will have much more use for mathematics than for Greek."

"I should think that, with all my life before me, I might study both; and even if I should have no use for it, it would do me no harm to understand it. Knowledge is never in the way, is it?"

"Certainly not half so often as ignorance. Very well; you shall learn Greek as fast as you please. I should like to hear you read something. Here is Goldsmith's 'Deserted Village'; suppose you try a few lines; begin here at 'Sweet was the sound.'"

She read aloud the passage designated, and as he expressed himself satisfied, and took the book from her hand, Mrs. Murray said:

"I think the child is as inveterate a bookworm as I ever knew; but for heaven's sake, Mr. Hammond, do not make her a blue-stocking."

"Ellen, did you ever see a genuine blue-stocking?"

"I am happy to be able to say that I never was so unfortunate!"

"You consider yourself lucky then, in not having known De Staël, Hannah More, Charlotte Brontë, and Mrs. Brown-ing?"

"To be consistent, of course, I must answer yes; but you know we women are never supposed to understand that term, much less possess the jewel itself; and besides, sir, you take undue advantage of me, for the women you mention were truly great geniuses. I was not objecting to genius in women."

"Without those auxiliaries and adjuncts which you deprecate so earnestly, would their native genius ever have distinguished them, or charmed and benefited the world? Brilliant success makes blue-stockings autocratic, and the world flatters and crowns them; but unsuccessful aspirants are strangled with an offensive sobriquet, than which it were better that they had mill-stones tied about their necks. After all, Ellen, it is rather ludicrous, and seems very unfair, that the whole class of literary ladies should be sneered at on account of the color of Stillingfleet's stockings, eighty years ago."

"If you please, sir, I should like to know the meaning of 'blue-stocking'?" said Edna.

"You are in a fair way to understand it if you study Greek," answered Mrs. Murray, laughing at the puzzled expression of the child's countenance.

Mr. Hammond smiled, and replied:

"A 'blue-stocking,' my dear, is generally supposed to be a lady, neither young, pleasant, nor pretty (and in most instances unmarried); who is unamiable, ungraceful, and untidy; ignorant of all domestic accomplishments and truly feminine acquirements, and ambitious of appearing very learned; a woman whose fingers are more frequently adorned with ink-spots than thimble; who holds housekeeping in detestation, and talks loudly about politics, science, and philosophy; who is ugly, and learned, and cross; whose hair is never smooth and whose ruffles are never fluted. Is that a correct likeness, Ellen?"

"As good as one of Brady's photographs. Take warning, Edna."

"The title of 'blue-stocking,' " continued the pastor, "originated in a jest many, many years ago, when a circle of very brilliant, witty, and elegant ladies in London met at the house of Mrs. Vesey, to listen to and take part in the conversation of some of the most gifted and learned men England has ever produced. One of those gentlemen, Stillingfleet, who always wore blue stockings, was so exceedingly agreeable and instructive, that when he chanced to be absent the company declared the party was a failure without 'the blue stockings,' as he was familiarly called. A Frenchman who heard of the circumstance, gave to these conversational gatherings the name of bas bleu, which means blue stocking; and hence, you see, that in popular acceptance, I mean in public opinion, the humorous title, which was given in compliment to a very charming gentleman, is now supposed to belong to very tiresome, pedantic, and disagreeable ladies. Do you understand the matter now?"

"I do not quite understand why ladies have not as good a right to be learned and wise as gentlemen."

"To satisfy you on that point would involve more historical discussion than we have time for this morning; some day we will look into the past and find a solution of the question. Meanwhile you may study as hard as you please, and remember, my dear, that where one woman is considered a blue-stocking, and tiresomely learned, twenty are more tiresome still because they know nothing. I will obtain all the books you need, and hereafter you must come to me every morning at nine o'clock. When the weather is good, you can easily walk over from Mrs. Murray's."

As they drove homeward, Edna asked:

"Has Mr. Hammond a family?"

"No; he lost his family years ago. But why do you ask that question?"

"I saw no lady, and I wondered who kept the house in such nice order."

"He has a very faithful servant who attends to his household affairs. In your intercourse with Mr. Hammond be careful not to allude to his domestic afflictions."

Mrs. Murray looked earnestly, searchingly at the girl, as if striving to fathom her thoughts; then throwing her head back with the haughty air which Edna had remarked in St. Elmo, she compressed her lips, lowered her veil, and remained silent and abstracted until they reached home.

* * * * *

The comprehensive and very thorough curriculum of studies now eagerly commenced by Edna, and along which she was gently and skilfully guided by the kind hand of her teacher, furnished the mental aliment for which she hungered, gave constant and judicious exercise to her active intellect, and induced her to visit the quiet parsonage library as assiduously as did Horace, Valgius, and Virgil the gardens on the Esquiline where Maecenas held his literary assize. Instead of skimming a few text-books that cram the brain with unwieldy scientific technicalities and pompous philosophic terminology, her range of thought and study gradually stretched out into a broader, grander cycle, embracing, as she grew older, the application of those great principles that underlie modern science and crop out in ever-varying phenomena and empirical classifications. Edna's tutor seemed impressed with the fallacy of the popular system of acquiring one branch of learning at a time, locking it away as in drawers of rubbish, never to be opened, where it moulders in shapeless confusion till swept out ultimately to make room for more recent scientific voices. Thus in lieu of the educational plan of "finishing natural philosophy and chemistry this session, and geology and astronomy next term, and taking up moral science and criticism the year we graduate," Mr. Hammond allowed his pupil to finish and lay aside none of her studies; but sought to impress upon her the great value of Blackstone's aphorism: "For sciences are of a sociable disposition, and flourish best in the neighborhood of each other; nor is there any branch of learning but may be helped and improved by assistance drawn from other arts."

Finding that her imagination was remarkably fertile, he required her, as she advanced in years to compose essays, letters, dialogues, and sometimes orations, all of which were not only written and handed in for correction, but he frequently directed her to recite them from memory, and invited her to assist him, while he dissected and criticised either her diction, line of argument, choice of metaphors, or intonation of voice. In these compositions he encouraged her to seek illustrations from every department of letters, and convert her theme into a focus, upon which to pour all the concentrated light which research could reflect, assuring her that what is often denominated "far-fetchedness," in metaphors, furnished not only evidence of the laborious industry of the writer, but is an implied compliment to the cultured taste and general knowledge of those for whose entertainment or edification they are employed—provided always said metaphors and similes really illustrate, elucidate, and adorn the theme discussed—when properly understood.

His favorite plea in such instances was, "If Humboldt and Cuvier, and Linnæus, and Ehrenberg have made mankind their debtors by scouring the physical cosmos for scientific data, which every living savant devours, assimilates, and reproduces in dynamic, physiologic, or entomologic theories, is it not equally laudable in scholars, orators, and authors—nay, is it not obligatory on them, to subsidize the vast cosmos of literature, to circumnavigate the world of belles-lettres, in search of new hemispheres of thought, and spice islands of illustrations; bringing their rich gleanings to the great public mart, where men barter their intellectual merchandise? Wide as the universe, and free as its winds, should be the range of human mind."

Yielding allegiance to the axiom that "the proper study of mankind is man," and recognizing the fact that history faithfully epitomizes the magnificent triumphs and stupendous failures, the grand capacities and innate frailties of the races, he fostered and stimulated his pupil's fondness for historic investigation; while in impressing upon her memory the chronologic sequence of events he not only grouped into great epochs the principal dramas, over which Clio holds august critical tribunal, but so carefully selected her miscellaneous reading, that poetry, novels, biography, and essays reflected light upon the actors of the particular epoch which she was studying; and thus through the subtle but imperishable links of association of ideas, chained them in her mind.

The extensive library at Le Bocage, and the valuable collection of books at the parsonage, challenged research, and, with a boundless ambition, equalled only by her patient, persevering application, Edna devoted herself to the acquisition of knowledge, and astonished and delighted her teacher by the rapidity of her progress and the vigor and originality of her restless intellect.

The noble catholicity of spirit that distinguished Mr. Hammond's character encouraged her to discuss freely the ethical and psychological problems that arrested her attention as she grew older, and facilitated her appreciation and acceptance of the great fact, that all bigotry springs from narrow minds and partial knowledge. He taught her that truth, scorning monopolies and deriding patents, lends some valuable element to almost every human system; that ignorance, superstition, and intolerance are the red-handed Huns that ravage society, immolating the pioneers of progress upon the shrine of prejudice—fettering science—blindly bent on divorcing natural and revealed truth, which "God hath joined together" in holy and eternal wedlock; and while they battle à l'outrance with every innovation, lock the wheels of human advancement, turning a deaf ear to the thrilling cry:

Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns.

If Carlyle be correct in his declaration that "Truly a thinking man is the worst enemy the prince of darkness can have, and every time such a one announces himself there runs a shudder through the nether empire, where new emissaries are trained with new tactics, to hoodwink and handcuff him," who can doubt that the long dynasty of Eblis will instantly terminate, when every pulpit in Christendom, from the frozen shores of Spitzbergen to the green dells of Owhyhee, from shining spires of Europe to the rocky battlements that front the Pacific, shall be filled with meek and holy men of ripe scholarship and resistless eloquence, whose scientific erudition keeps pace with their evangelical piety, and whose irreproachable lives attest that their hearts are indeed hallowed temples of that loving charity "that suffereth long, and is kind; that vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up; thinketh no evil; beareth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things?"

While Christ walked to and fro among the palms and poppies of Palestine, glorifying anew an accursed and degraded human nature, unlettered fishermen, who mended their nets and trimmed their sails along the blue waves of Galilee, were fit instruments, in his guiding hands, for the dissemination of his Gospel; but when the days of the Incarnation ended, and Jesus returned to the Father, all the learning and the mighty genius of Saul of Tarsus were required to confront and refute the scoffing sophists who, replete with philhellenic lore, and within sight of the marvellous triglyphs and metopes of the Parthenon, gathered on Mars Hill to defend their marble altars to the Unknown God.

BERYL'S DEFENCE

From 'At the Mercy of Tiberius.' Copyright, G. W. Dillingham Company, and used here by permission of the publishers.

. . . As he ushered her into the court-room, Judge Dent met her, took her hand, and led her to the seat where Dyce and Sister Serena awaited her return:

"My poor child, be courageous now; and remember that you have some friends here, who are praying God to help and deliver you."

"Did He deliver His own Son from the pangs of death? Pray that I may be patient to endure."

One swift glance showed her that Mr. Dunbar, forsaking his former place beside the district attorney, was sitting very near, just in front of her. The jurymen filed slowly into their accustomed seats, and the judge, who had been resting his head on his hand, straightened himself, and put aside a book. There was an ominous hush pervading the dense crowd, and in that moment of silent expectancy, Beryl shut her eyes and communed with her God. Some mystical exaltation of soul removed her from the realm of nervous dread; and a peace, that this world neither gives nor takes away, settled upon her. Sister Serena untied and took off the crape veil and bonnet, and as she resumed her seat, Judge Parkman turned to the prisoner:

"In assuming the responsibility of your own defence you have adopted a line of policy which, however satisfactory to yourself, must, in the opinion of the public, have a tendency to invest your cause with peculiar peril; therefore I impress upon you the fact, that while the law holds you innocent, until twelve men agree that the evidence proves you guilty, the time has arrived when your cause depends upon your power to refute the charges, and disprove the alleged facts arrayed against you. The discovery and elucidation of Truth, is the supreme aim of a court of justice, and to its faithful ministers the defence of innocence is even more imperative than the conviction of guilt. The law is a Gibraltar, fortified and armed by the consummate wisdom of successive civilizations, as an impregnable refuge for innocence; and here, within its protecting bulwarks, as in the house of a friend, you are called on to plead your defence. You have heard the charges of the prosecution; listened to the testimony of the witnesses; and having taken your cause into your own hands, you must now stand up and defend it."

She rose and walked a few steps closer to the jury, and for the first time during the trial, looked at them steadily. White as a statue of Purity, she stood for a moment, with her wealth of shining auburn hair coiled low on her shapely head, and waving in soft outlines around her broad, full brow. Unnaturally calm, and wonderfully beautiful in that sublime surrender, which like a halo illumines the myth of Antigone, it was not strange that every heart thrilled, when upon the strained ears of the multitude fell the clear, sweet, indescribably mournful voice:

"When a magnolia blossom or a white camellia just fully open, is snatched by violent hands, bruised, crushed, blackened, scarred by rents, is it worth keeping? No power can undo the ruin, and since all that made it lovely—its stainless purity—is irrevocably destroyed, why preserve it? Such a pitiable wreck you have made of the young life I am bidden to stand up and defend. Have you left me anything to live for? Dragged by constables before prejudiced strangers, accused of awful crimes, denounced as a female monster, herded with convicts, can you imagine any reason why I should struggle to prolong a disgraced, hopelessly ruined existence? My shrivelled, mutilated life is in your hands, and if you decide to crush it quickly, you will save me much suffering; as when having, perhaps unintentionally, mangled some harmless insect, you mercifully turn back, grind it under your heel, and end its torture. My life is too wretched now to induce me to defend it, but there is something I hold far dearer, my reputation as an honorable Christian woman; something I deem most sacred of all—the unsullied purity of the name my father and mother bore. Because I am innocent of every charge made against me, I owe it to my dead, to lift their honored name out of the mire. I have pondered the testimony; and the awful mass of circumstances that have combined to accuse me, seems indeed so overwhelming, that as each witness came forward, I have asked myself, am I the victim of some baleful destiny, placed in the grooves of destroying fate—foreordained from the foundations of the world to bear the burden of another's guilt? You have been told that I killed General Darrington, and stole his money and jewels, and destroyed his will, in order to possess his estate. Trustworthy witnesses have sworn to facts, which I cannot deny, and you believe these facts; and yet, while the snare tightens around my feet, and I believe you intend to condemn me, I stand here, and look you in the face—as one day we thirteen will surely stand at the final judgment—and in the name of the God I love, and fear, and trust, I call you each to witness, that I am innocent of every charge in the indictment. My hands are as unstained, my soul is as unsullied by theft or bloodshed, as your sinless babes cooing in their cradles.

“If you can clear your minds of the foul tenants thrust into them, try for a little while to forget all the monstrous crimes you have heard ascribed to me, and as you love your mothers, wives, daughters, go back with me, leaving prejudice behind, and listen dispassionately to my most melancholy story. The river of death rolls so close to my weary feet, that I speak as one on the brink of eternity; and as I hope to meet my God in peace, I shall tell you the truth. Sometimes it almost shakes our faith in God's justice, when we suffer terrible consequences, solely because we did our duty; and it seems to me bitterly hard, inscrutable, that all my misfortunes should have come upon me thick and fast, simply because I obeyed my mother. You, fathers, say to your children, 'Do this for my sake,' and lovingly they spring to accomplish your wishes; and when they are devoured by agony, and smothered by disgrace, can you sufficiently pity them, blind artificers of their own ruin?

"Four months ago I was a very poor girl, but proud and happy, because by my own work I could support my mother and myself. Her health failed rapidly, and life hung upon an operation and certain careful subsequent treatment, which it required one hundred dollars to secure. I was competing for a prize that would lift us above want, but time pressed; the doctor urged prompt action and my mother desired me to come South, see her father, deliver a letter and beg assistance. As long as possible, I resisted her entreaties, because I shrank from the degradation of coming as a beggar to the man who, I knew, had disinherited and disowned his daughter.

"Finally, strangling my rebellious reluctance, I accepted the bitter task. My mother kissed me good-bye, laid her hands on my head and blessed me for acceding to her wishes; and so—following the finger of Duty—I came here to be trampled, mangled, destroyed. When I arrived, I found I could catch a train going north at 7:15, and I bought a return ticket, and told the agent I intended to take that train. I walked to 'Elm Bluff,' and after waiting a few moments was admitted to General Darrington's presence. The letter which I delivered was an appeal for one hundred dollars, and it was received with an outburst of wrath, a flood of fierce and bitter denunciation of my parents. The interview was indescribably painful, but toward its close, General Darrington relented. He opened his safe or vault, and took out a square tin box. Placing it on the table, he removed some papers, and counted down into my hand, five gold coins—twenty dollars each. When I turned to leave him, he called me back, gave me the morocco case, and stated that the sapphires were very costly, and could be sold for a large amount. He added, with great bitterness, that he gave them, simply because they were painful souvenirs of a past, which he was trying to forget; and that he had intended them as a bridal gift to his son Prince's wife; but as they had been bought by my mother's mother as a present for her only child, he would send them to their original destination, for the sake of his first wife, Helena.

"I left the room by the veranda door, because he bade me do so, to avoid what he termed 'the prying of servants.' I broke some clusters of chrysanthemums blooming in the rose garden, to carry to my mother, and then I hurried away. If the wages of disobedience be death, then fate reversed the mandate, and obedience exacts my life as a forfeit. Think of it: I had ample time to reach the station before seven o'clock, and if I had gone straight on, all would have been well. I should have taken the 7.15 train, and left forever this horrible place. If I had not loitered, I should have seen once more my mother's face, have escaped shame, despair, ruin—oh! the blessedness of what 'might have been!'

"Listen, my twelve judges, and pity the child who obeyed at all hazards. Poor though I was, I bought a small bouquet for my sick mother the day that I left her, and the last thing she did was to arrange the flowers, tie them with a wisp of faded blue ribbon, and putting them in my hand, she desired me to be sure to stop at the cemetery, find her mother's grave in the Darrington lot, and lay the bunch of blossoms for her upon her mother's monument. Mother's last words were: 'Don't forget to kneel down and pray for me, at mother's grave.'"

The voice so clear, so steady hitherto, quivered, ceased; and the heavy lashes drooped to hide the tears that gathered; but it was only for a few seconds, and she resumed in the same cold, distinct tone:

"So I went on, and fate tied the last millstone around my neck. After some search I found the place, and left the bunch of flowers with a few of the chrysanthemums; then I hastened toward town, and reached the station too late; the 7.15 train had gone. Too late!—only a half hour lost, but it carried down everything that this world held for me. I used to wonder and puzzle over that passage in the Bible, 'The stars in their courses fought against Sisera!' I have solved that mystery, for the 'stars in their courses' have fought against me; heaven, earth, man, time, circumstances, coincidences, all spun the web that snared my innocent feet. When I paid for the telegram to relieve my mother's suspense, I had not sufficient money (without using the gold) to enable me to incur hotel bills; and I asked permission to remain in the waiting room until the next train, which was due at 3.05. The room was so close and warm I walked out, and the fresh air tempted me to remain. The moon was up, full and bright, and knowing no other street, I unconsciously followed the one I had taken in the afternoon. Very soon I reached the point near the old church where the road crosses, and I turned into it, thinking that I would enjoy one more breath of the pine forest, which was so new to me. It was so oppressively hot I sat down on the pine straw, and fanned myself with my hat. How long I remained there, I know not, for I fell asleep; and when I awoke, Mr. Dunbar rode up and asked if I had lost my way. I answered that I had not, and as soon as he galloped on, I walked back as rapidly as possible, somewhat frightened at the loneliness of my position. Already clouds were gathering, and I had been in the waiting-room, I think about an hour, when the storm broke in its fury. I had seen the telegraph operator sitting in his office, but he seemed asleep, with his head resting on the table; and during the storm I sat on the floor, in one corner of the waiting-room, and laid my head on a chair. At last, when the tempest ended, I went to sleep. During that sleep, I dreamed of my old home in Italy, of some of my dead, of my father—of gathering grapes with one I dearly loved—and suddenly some noise made me spring to my feet. I heard voices talking, and in my feverish, dreamy state, there seemed a resemblance to one I knew. Only half awake, I ran out on the pavement. Whether I dreamed the whole, I cannot tell; but the conversation seemed strangely distinct; and I can never forget the words, be they real, or imaginary:

" 'There ain't no train till daylight, 'cepting it be the through freight.'

"Then a different voice asked: 'When is that due?'

" 'Pretty soon I reckon, it's mighty nigh time now, but it don't stop here; it goes on to the water tank, where it blows for the bridge.'

" 'How far is the bridge?'

“ ‘Only a short piece down the track, after you pass the tank.’

“When I reached the street, I saw no one but the figure of an old man, I think a negro, who was walking away. He limped and carried a bundle on the end of a stick thrown over his shoulder. I was so startled and impressed by the fancied sound of a voice once familiar to me, that I walked on down the track, but could see no one. Soon the ‘freight’ came along; I stood aside until it passed, then returned to the station, and found the agent standing in the door. When he questioned me about my movements, I deemed him impertinent; but having nothing to conceal, stated the facts I have just recapitulated. You have been told that I intentionally missed the train; that when seen at 10 p.m. in the pine woods, I was stealing back to my mother’s old home; that I entered at midnight the bedroom where her father slept, stupefied him with chloroform, broke open his vault, robbed it of money, jewels and will; and that when General Darrington awoke and attempted to rescue his property, I deliberately killed him. You are asked to believe that I am ‘the incarnate fiend’ who planned and committed that horrible crime, and, alas for me! every circumstance seems like a bloodhound to bay me. My handkerchief was found, tainted with chloroform. It was my handkerchief; but how it came there, on General Darrington’s head, only God witnessed. I saw among the papers taken from the tin box and laid on the table, a large envelope marked in red ink, ‘Last Will and Testament of Robert Luke Darrington’; but I never saw it afterward. I was never in that room but once; and the last and only time I ever saw General Darrington was when I passed out of the glass door, and left him standing in the middle of the room, with the tin box in his hand.

“I can call no witnesses; for it is one of the terrible fatalities of my situation that I stand alone, with none to corroborate my assertions. Strange, inexplicable coincidences drag me down; not the malice of men, but the throttling grasp of circumstances. I am the victim of some diabolical fate, which only innocent blood will appease; but though I am slaughtered for crimes I did not commit, I know, oh! I know, that behind fate, stands God!—the just and eternal God, whom I trust, even in this my hour of extremest peril. Alone in the world, orphaned, reviled, wrecked for all time, without a ray of hope, I, Beryl Brentano, deny every accusation brought against me in this cruel arraignment; and I call my only witness, the righteous God above us, to hear my solemn asseveration: I am innocent of this crime; and when you judicially murder me in the name of Justice, your hands will be dyed in blood that an avenging God will one day require of you. Appearances, circumstances, coincidences of time and place, each, all, conspire to hunt me into a convict's grave; but remember, my twelve judges, remember that a hopeless, forsaken, broken-hearted woman, expecting to die at your hands, stood before you, and pleaded first and last—Not Guilty! Not Guilty!—”

A moment she paused, then raised her arms toward heaven and added, with a sudden exultant ring in her thrilling voice, and a strange rapt splendor in her uplifted eyes:

“Innocent! Innocent! Thou God knowest! Innocent of this sin, as the angels that see Thy face.”

ROBERT BURNS WILSON

[1850—]

IDA WITHERS HARRISON

ROBERT BURNS WILSON was born away from home. He is a Virginian, born in Pennsylvania; but as all his life, except the past six years, has been passed in Virginia and Kentucky, he can certainly be classed among Southern writers. His paternal grandfather, Robert Wilson, came from the north of Ireland and made his home in Washington County, Pennsylvania, and it was there our author first saw the light. His father, an architect and builder, took a Virginia bride, and made his home there after his marriage. His maternal grandmother, Lucy Alice Nelson, of Hanover County, Virginia, married a MacLean, of the old Scotch family of that name. His mother, Elizabeth Anne MacLean, died when he was barely ten years old; the following dedication in his first volume of poetry shows his deep sense of debt and devotion to her:

"TO ELIZABETH, MY MOTHER."

"The green Virginian hills were blithe in May,
And we were plucking violets, thou and I.
A transient gladness flooded earth and sky;
Thy fading strength seemed to return that day,
And I was mad with hope that God would stay
Death's pale approach—Oh! all hath long passed by!
Long years! Long years! and now, I well know why
Thine eyes, quick filled with tears, were turned away.
First loved—first lost, my mother!—Time must still Leave my soul's debt uncanceled. All that's best,
In me, and in my art, is thine—Meseems,
Even now, we walk afield. Through good and ill
My sorrowing heart forgets not, and in dreams,
I see thee, in the sun lands of the blest."

He writes of his childhood's home in Virginia: "My first recollection of life is of an old orchard in full bloom, with the blossoms falling on the dark, newly ploughed ground. The ploughing was going on, and the man allowed me to ride on the tram of the plough, sitting between the handles. I remember the blackbirds following in the furrows, feeding on the worms." This first consciousness of life was a fitting beginning for a poet—spring, and birds, and apple-blossoms.

He also writes: "I seem to have been born with a pencil in my hand—the fated symbol of my life!—For my whole life has been bound up with it. I have lived always, it seems to me, by drawing, and painting, and writing. This bent I inherited largely from my mother, who painted flowers beautifully. I suppose I wrote in my youth some ten thousand poems more or less, which were laid away somewhere on the planet, but were certainly never published."

He moved to Kentucky when a young man, and lived in Frankfort, the capital, until he went to New York City, about six years ago. There could have been no happier environment for so loving a student of nature as Mr. Wilson than this quaint old town, surrounded by hills, and cleft in twain by the beautiful Kentucky River. His appreciation of its charm is shown in his sonnet, "Away from my Loved Hills," written when he left Frankfort for New York. He was married in 1901 to Anne Hendrick, daughter of William Jackson Hendrick, Attorney-general of Kentucky. His only child, Elizabeth, was born in Frankfort, and is now seven years old.

Robert Burns Wilson is painter as well as poet. It is strange that one so rarely sees the union of these closely allied arts in a single person. It was found in Dante Gabriel Rossetti, and it is hard to say in which calling he excelled. Sidney Lanier was poet and musician, and we cannot but think his exquisite ear for harmonies of sound added new depth and richness to his poetry. So, Mr. Wilson's work in one line of art has not detracted from his whole-hearted pursuit of the other.

He is his own master in painting, and follows his own ideals. He says: "Painting, to me, is not an imitation merely, but an interpretation of Nature. There is, in fact, but one art—the interpreting of nature; music, poetry, painting, sculpture and architecture are forms of expression of the same art. To me, every landscape has its mood and its soul. While one should never fail to know, and to present the actual, yet this intangible soul is what the artist should strive for. I seek to catch the passing and illusive things in nature, which do not 'sit' for their pictures—the drift of clouds, the transient effect of light and shadow, early morning and twilight, which vanish while you look. These things must be recalled and re-developed by the imagination, and painted from memory."

With such ideals in art, reënforced by his mastery of line, and color, and grouping, it is not strange that his landscapes have an original charm; they possess in a high degree that difficult thing we call atmosphere, and in addition a soul and a sentiment that make them painted poesy. The limits of this sketch permit but brief mention of Mr. Wilson as a painter. He has painted many pictures, portraits as well as landscapes. His work has received recognition from various societies. Since he has been in New York, his pictures have been shown at the annual exhibitions of the American Water-color Society, and the Water-color Society of New York. Some of his subjects show the poet as well as the painter; for instance: "The Elegy Plowman," illustrating lines from Gray's "Elegy," "The Quiet Fields," "The Marsh," "The Land of the Sky," "The Dreaming Trees," "Omar's Rose," illustrating lines from Omar Kháyyam.

Mr. Wilson believes that the two arts, poetry and painting, are mutually helpful. He writes that he is painting a picture, "The Cedars of Culmer's Hill," and as he worked the deep meaning of it came to him as a poem on which he has also begun work.

He says of this relation of the two arts: "A poem may so paint a picture that one may receive the impress of color and form, of mood and of feeling. So, also, a painting may be so much a poem, that one can catch the music and the thought and seem to hear the numbers as they speak."

No careful reader of Mr. Wilson's poems can fail to find this pictorial quality in his verse. In one of his most beautiful pieces, "When Evening Cometh On," the first five stanzas are as perfect pictures, as if they had been drawn with pencil and brush.

While Mr. Wilson had been writing verses ever since he could remember, it was not until some time in the 'seventies of the last century that he began to publish them in various papers and periodicals. His first appearance in the great magazines was "The Death of Winter" in Harper's Magazine, soon followed by "When Evening Cometh On," "The Song of the Wind," and many others. His first poem in the Century Magazine was "Keats"; then appeared "Sonnets of the Sun," "Would We Return," "I Shall Find Rest," and "The Angel of Sleep." At the time of the Spanish-American War he wrote many stirring martial poems. His "Remember the Maine" was given a full front page in the New York Herald. "Such is the Death the Soldier Dies" was published in the Atlantic Monthly, and many of the great dailies gladly published his patriotic verse.

Among his best poems might be mentioned: "The Shadows of the Trees," "Lines to a Child," "A Walk With a Child," "Sonnets of Sunshine and Rain," "Sonnets of Similitude," "Sonnets on the Winter Hill," "The Angel of Sleep," "When Evening Cometh On,"

"Reed Call for April," "My Lady Sleeps," "The Song Soul," "The Passing of March," "Dust and Ashes," "In Memoriam."

Mr. Wilson uses the lighter lyrical measures with equal grace and facility; his "Reed Call for April" is an example of this. He has the true artist's passion for perfection in form and expression, and is his own sternest critic. He is full of generous enthusiasm for goodness and greatness in others, and is always willing to lend his aid on commemoration occasions. He has written noble odes to Robert E. Lee, to Abraham Lincoln, and to Edgar Allan Poe. His last tribute to the latter was at the Poe Centennial, at the University of Virginia, and for this he received one of the highly prized Poe Centenary Medals.

Like Wordsworth, the whole of animal life is dear to him. He knows all the birds, and writes of them with intimate friendship and sympathy. How happy is this brief description:

"The oriole

Like some enchanted sou,
Amidst the emerald leafage went and came,
A voiceful fire, a song clad in bright flame."

But his love is not only for the tuneful and lovely oriole, and red-bird, and mocking-bird, he has tender thought for the homely and unlovely in animal life.

One evening at Ashland, the home of Henry Clay, the conversation turned on the turkey as a characteristic American bird, and some one remarked that no poetry ever had been or could be written on a turkey. The next morning Mr. Wilson handed to the mistress of the house his beautiful sonnet, "Evening at Ashland," where the sestet begins:

"Across the lawn, the turkey and her brood,
A straggling group, wend to some restful spot
Where no unfriendly footstep may intrude."

But while Mr. Wilson sees beauty and meaning in many things, yet he is primarily and preëminently the poet and interpreter of nature; what he has said of the interpretation of nature in painting is true of his poetry also—he describes nature so as to give us its mood and its soul. He finds beauty in every season, not only the joy and loveliness of spring and summer, but the "gray, quiet days of winter," and the "Tyrian-tinted woodlands" of autumn. But while the natural note of sadness predominates in these descriptions of nature's death, yet the note of cheer goes with it. "It is in winter that we dream of spring," and "The death of hope must be the new hope's birth," are characteristic lines of his.

A dreamer—yes! One given to the whole-hearted pursuit of beautiful ideas, and therefore but little fitted for life's practical struggles. But, because he is a dreamer, therefore is he all the more a poet and painter; surely we do not claim too much when we count him one of the rare poets of our day—a brother spirit to Sidney Lanier, and deserving to take high place among the poets of the South.

UNCERTAINTY

From Life and Love. Copyright, O. M. Dunham, and used here by permission.

The soul puts forth some venture—then we say,
I know full well I surely shall succeed,
And yet we know, we know not—we ourselves,
Make of ourselves false prophets to our souls,
And fain would we believe that we are true;
Yet do we love to toss the ball of chance,
And in the relish of uncertainty,
We find a spring for action which were lost,
Could we foresee the struggle to the end.
The riddle, guessed, awakens thought no more,
Nor would this life have value in our eyes
Could we outrun the turning of its leaves
And read, to-day, to-morrow's hidden page.

And so its sadness, its uncertainty,
Becomes its joy, the spring of secret hope,
That what is dark may turn to brightness yet,
That what is good, will stay; and so we live.
I would not know the end lest I should fall
Despairing in the field—where, knowing not,
How valueless should seem the tinsel crown—
My arm might win some conquest that should be
A joy to others, though I knew it not;
Some needed help, which, else, I should forego.

THE SUMMER RAIN

From 'Life and Love.'

Sweet, blessed summer rain—ah me!
The drifting cloud-land spills
God's mercy on the dotted lea,
And on the tented hills;

Yet is there more than shrouded sky,
And more than falling rain,
Or swift-borne souls of flowers that fly
Breeze-lifted from the plain.

Strange joy comes with the freshening gust
The whitening of the leaves,
The smell of sprinkled summer dust,
The dripping of the eaves;

The soul stirs with the melting clod,
The drenched field's silent mirth:—
Who does not feel his heart help God
To bless the thirsting earth?

Oh, rain—oh, blessed summer rain!—
Not on the fields, alone,
Nor woodlands, fall, nor flowery plain,
But on the heart of stone!

SUNRISE AND SUNSET

From 'Life and Love.'

SUNRISE

Flame-hearted lover of the Earth—great Sun!
Rise from thy purple couch; stretch forth thine arms
Through morning's parted curtain; let the charms
Of waiting love—which it were death to shun—
Persuade thy clasp. Now hath the Earth begun
To loose her robes of mist; with mock alarms
She yields her beauty, which love's longing warms,
Forestalling the embrace thy kiss hath won.

Arise, great god of light and life, arise,
Enfold the fond Earth in the deathless glowing
Of thy fierce love; bend from the shimmering skies
Which burn before thee in thine onward going.
No cheer have we, and not of thy bestowing;
Thou art the joy of all hope-lifted eyes.

SUNSET

Within thy burning palace in the West
Thou art awhile withdrawn. Yet doth thy face
Look from the closing portal for a space
Back to the Earth, which thy dear love hath blessed;
While she with tears and soft sighs half-repressed
Beholds thee sinking in thy resting-place,
As with up-gathered folds of dewy lace
She hugs remembrance to her yearning breast.

Thy glory darkens, and the careful Night
Hangs out the moon's pale lamp while yet the flush
On Evening's face—with thy departing light—
Turns from rose-pink to crimson, till the blush
Dies with the coming stars, and slumber's hush
Wraps thy warm bride, who waits thy waking might.

THE SOUL

From 'Life and Love.'

Never the soul is seen on earth,
Nor known, nor its destiny—never!—
Nor the place, nor the cause, nor the time of its birth,
Nor its songs, nor its anguish, its sins, nor its worth,
Nor its sorrowing long endeavor;
Unheard when it cries,
Unseen when it flies,
The soul is alone forever.

WOULD WE RETURN?

From 'Life and Love.'

Would we return
If once the gates which close upon the past
Were opened wide for us, and if the dear
Remembered pathway stretched before us, clear,
To lead us back to youth's lost land at last;
Whereon life's April shadows lightly cast,
Recalled the old sweet days of childish fear
With all their faded hopes and brought anear
The far-off streams in which our skies were glassed;
Did these lost dreams which wake the soul's sad yearning
But live once more and wait for our returning,
Would we return?

Would we return
If love's enchantment held the heart no more
And we had come to count the wild sweet pain,
The fond distress, the lavish tears—but vain;
Had cooled the heart's hot wounds amidst the roar
Of mountain gales, or, on some alien shore
Worn out the soul's long anguish, and had slain
The dragon of despair—if then the train
Of vanished years came back, and, as of yore,
The same voice called, and, with soft eyes beguiling
Our lost love beckoned, through time's gray veil smiling,
Would we return?

Would we return

Once we had crossed to death's unlovely land
And trod the bloomless ways among the dead,
Lone and unhappy; after years had fled

With twilight wings along that glimmering strand,
If then—an angel came with outstretched hand
To lead us back, and we recalled in dread
How soon the tears that once for us are shed

May flow for others—how, like words in sand,
Our memory fades away—how oft our waking
Might vex the living with the dead heart's breaking,

Would we return—
Would we return?

MY LOVE GOETH FORTH

From 'Life and Love.'

Soft is the sky, and the joy of birds
Breaks from the copse on the budding brae,
And the air hath the dream of the peaceful herds
That graze in the fields to-day.
And the brook hath a turn in its wavering strain
That steals to my heart like a passionate thought,
The phantoms of evil assail me in vain
And I set the world's wisdom at naught.
For my Love goeth forth and her robes are white,
White like the clouds at the break of the dawn,
Fair—fair—and a madness doth burn in my sight,
Lest the vision should be withdrawn:
My Love goeth forth and the lingering air
Lifteth up the soft tresses that shadow her eyes,
'Tis an angel—I say—hath been drawn by my prayer
To come down from that land in the skies.

What envious hand doth lay
The keen blade to the grasses?
What blight hath turned to gray
The flowering woodland passes?

Dull is the sky, the mingling joy of birds
Sounds from the dell, but music's balm hath fled.
I hear the lowing of returning herds,
But hope and love are dead.
The brook's soft voice doth murmur at my feet
Like some lost voice that calleth from afar
The withered leaves sail like a mournful fleet,
Which cometh back from war.

For my Love goeth forth and her robe is white,
White, like the snow in the cleft of the hill,
My Love goeth forth with the King in his might
And her hands are crossed and still,
My Love goeth forth and my wild despair
Can not lift the soft lashes which shadow her eyes,
'Tis an angel—I say—that in spite of my care
Goeth back to that land in the skies.

THAT MUSIC

From 'Life and Love.'

(TO MISS C. D.)

It fell down through the still, enchanted air
Like rain-drops trickling down through summer leaves
In some shade-saddened, silent forest, where
The spirit of fantastic beauty weaves
The dear, dead dreams of love and past despair
That have made wreck of men and maidens fair
In days that are gone by:
And the gladness,
So like sadness,
Moved my soul to minstrel madness:
Laughing, sighing, wailing, crying,
All the weeping world seemed dying,
Dying; and well pleased to die.

I SHALL FIND REST

From 'Life and Love.'

"A little further on—

There will be time—I shall find rest anon":
Thus do we say, when eager youth invites
Young Hope to try her wings in wanton flights,
And nimble Fancy builds the soul a nest
On some far crag:—But soon youth's flame is gone,
Burned lightly out, while we repeat the jest,
With smiling confidence—"I shall find rest,
A little further on."

"A little further on

I shall find rest"—half-fiercely, we avow,
When noon beats on the dusty field, and Care
Threats to unjoint our armor, and the glare
Throbs with the pulse of battle, while life's best
Flies with the flitting stars—the frenzied brow
Pains for the laurel, more than for the breast
Where love, soft-nestling, waits. Not now! not now!
With feverish breath we cry—"I shall find rest
A little further on."

"A little further on

I shall find rest"—half-sad, at last, we say.
When sorrow's settling cloud blurs out the gleam
Of Glory's torch, and, to a vanished dream
Love's palace hath been turned; then, all depressed,
Despairing, sick at heart, we may not stay
Our weary feet—so lonely then doth seem
This shadow-haunted world—we, so unblest,
Weep not, to see the grave, which waits its guest;
And, feeling round our feet, the cool sweet clay,
We speak the fading world, farewell, and say,
"Not on this side, alas!—I shall find rest,
A little further on."

THE WINTER NIGHT

From 'Life and Love.'

Now, bitter cold, the thin and vagrant air
Steals from the frozen shadows of the trees;
Dead are the hills that were so green and fair,
Hushed are the streams, and, joyless as the seas
Far-stretched beneath the cheerless polar sky,
The sad, snow-shrouded fields, in solemn silence lie.

A PRAYER

From 'Life and Love.'

To those on whom Thy hand hath laid the weight
Of song's sad gift—be merciful, O God!
Ah! theirs it is to count the wistful hours
Which fill the gaping void of lonely night:
Waking while others sleep, uncomforted
By loving voice or outstretched friendly hand;
Listening the swell of life's unwearied tide
Surge through the anxious chambers of the heart;
Eyeing the painful dark, whose yielding folds
Half hide the forms that airily go by
Upon their unknown noiseless pilgrimage;
By strange care haunted, lest some vision pass,
All unregarded, to return no more;
Hearkening the silence, lest some message fall
In vain, unheard, on slumber's heedless ear;
Wakeful and watchful, toiling, not for gold—
But for the harvest of the spirit's field,
Which waves unseen by all eyes save their own.
Such fate is theirs, on whom thy hand hath laid
Life's sweetest, saddest burden—song's dear gift.

SONNETS OF MAD WINDS AND SUNSHINE

From 'The Shadows of the Trees.' Copyright, 1898, by R. H. Russell, and used here by permission of the author and the publisher.

March-lions, ramping, with snow-brindled manes,
Leap, with the storm, along the airy floors
Whereon the mad winds roll, and with loud roars,
Bound, with soft-padded feet across the plains,
Sere from the frost, and beaten by the rains,
Denting the tufted grasses by the shores
Of shuddering, shallow pools, which dot the moors,
Where from, in driven loops, like hurtling chains,
Scared birds, swift-winged, out-fly the speeding gale.
The battling clouds above the woodlands gray,
Flaunting dim banners, pass in hurried flight,
Like some tumultuous dream. A mighty wail
Comes from the writhing trees, and far away,
The billowy landscape meets the coming night.

And when night comes, behold! the winds are still—
Like floating mountains the great clouds divide
And, in the space, with one star at her side
Swings the bright-mantled moon; the dripping hill
Looms in dark silence, and the little rill—
Pleased with its own soft music—threads the wide,
Faint-glimmering land, where broad cloud-shadows glide,
Changing the features of the fields at will.
They may be bare, the fields, or matted deep
With tawny grasses, brown with weeds, or green
With winter wheat, or lands whereon they fling
The weathering hemp, or maize-camps, fast asleep—
All now are blent in one fantastic scene,
Made for the moonlight's noiseless revelling.

The moonlight's noiseless revel—does she know,
Yon Princess of the ever-changing sky,
Floating serene, amidst the clouds on high,
That, where the woven shadows come and go,
Among the lacing twigs, and on the flow
Of chilly streams, that sing the slow night by,
There is uplifted many a tearful eye?

Pale blooms, close-nestling in the dabbled snow,
Sweet woodland spirits, tremulous and frail,
Clad in soft garb—in timid loveliness
Through dead leaves peeping by the rugged rocks;
Ill can they bear the unfriendly time, the shocks
And buffets of the storms, the ruthless hail,
And whirling snows, and drenching, numberless.

The whirling snows! With morning comes the sun;
Spangling the earth and air with glinting spears.
From emerald knolls the white veil disappears.
And, merrily, the snow-fed rillets run
Their sparkling, transient courses. One by one,
The forest streams grow loud with song that cheers
The glistening vales, the preening field-lark hears,
And pipes for joy of days not yet begun.
Uncertain are the skies. Precarious mirth
Rings in the drying thickets; on the peach,
Whose pink buds bloomed amidst the falling snows
The robin tries his note; the passing crows
Call down through films up-floating from the earth,
Towards the blue which they will never reach.

Towards the flashing blue—the crystalline,
Unfathomable sea of dazzling light,
Where rides the sun; soon are they vanquished quite
And only winds, low breathing, intervene
'Twixt the miraculous heavens and the scene
Of earth's enchantments. Every moment's flight Brings the immortal wonder of life's might—
Within the hour the banks are tinged with green.
As Love comes, came the change—a quickening flame
Stole through the woodland—down yon slope of gray—
Among the russet leaves, and, following, came—
Though all was silent there but yesterday—
Soft-echoing on the air, a warbling clear—
The blue-bird's voice!—The Spring! The Spring is here!

IN MEMORIAM

From 'The Shadows of the Trees.'

'Tis morning, and the gateway of the sun
Swings open; and across the summer land
Comes the resplendent Day. On every hand
The bright, fleet-footed beams, in gladness, run
Along the late-reaped fields, and one by one,
The vales, the dewy slopes, the trees that stand
Upon the hills, by languid breezes fanned,
Take on the glory of new life begun.
But she that should behold it—she is still.
Wrapped in the rayless shadow, mute she lies.
She heeds no more the songs upon the hill;
She wakes not to the wonder in the skies.
She, that was fair as is the summer's day;
Even with the summer she hath passed away.

The flower falls with the grain, and in the sheaf
The opening rose is gathered; she that stood
Like some young tree amidst the summer wood,
Clad in fresh bloom, hath found a day as brief;
No more she knoweth, now, of joy or grief;
Alike to her, the evil and the good.
So sleeps she, in immortal maidenhood—
That she, indeed, is dead, is past belief.
Come, O ye loving winds of heaven, and bring
Across the spaces, perilous and wide,
Some tidings from the spirits that abide
Beyond our love and our remembering!
In tearful hope we bide, ere yet shall fall
The voiceless shadow which awaits us all.

'Tis evening; and the great sun disappears
Beyond the Benson Hills. Alone she sleeps,
While twilight gathers on the tangled steeps.
Her bed is heaped with roses, wet with tears,
And over her a sheltering tree up-rears.
Far in the vale the river slowly creeps,
And soft winds whisper from the heavenly deeps,
"With Him one day is as a thousand years."

The silence deepens on the sacred hill;
As in a dream, the noiseless branches sway;
The world, and all it holds of good and ill,
Grows less and less, and strangely fades away;
While from the pale stars comes the whispering still,
"A thousand years, with Him, is as one day."

SONNETS OF SIMILITUDE

From 'The Shadows of the Trees.'

Life is a rich-robed angel, winged with light,
Whose will is still to leave us. No estate—
Gold-crowned, or starred with jewels—may bid her wait,
Nor fix a charmed delay upon her flight.
Life is a rainbow circle, through whose bright
And changing hues—blown by the breath of fate—
The myriad motes pass, quickly; soon or late,
The magic round, itself, will vanish quite.

Life is a voice, low-toned and sweet, that calls
Amidst the immortal solitudes, and they
That start, as from a dream, scarce can they say
I come—I come! when lo! the silence falls.
Life is a gift which no soul may refuse;
A priceless gift—a pearl—which whoso wears must lose.

Life is a darkness. They that walk therein
Set foot, each instant, on an unknown ground.
Life is a song, for which was never found
The fitting music; few are they that win
Even one true note, amidst the jangling din
Of nameless chords in which that strain is drowned.
Life is a wordless riddle, and so profound
That wisest guessers end where they begin.

Life is a tree, whose countless leaves, diverse,
Flaunt in the sun of hope through one brief day;
Whose blooms seem half-divine, despite the curse
Beneath whose touch they fail and fade away.
Life is a woven mantle, soft and fair,
Which we put on with tears and put off in despair.

WOODROW WILSON

[1856—]

STOCKTON AXSON

WOODROW WILSON was born in Staunton, Virginia, December 28, 1856. His father was the Rev. Joseph R. Wilson, one of the stalwart men of the Southern Presbyterian Church. His mother, born Jessie Woodrow, was of Scotch-Irish blood, her forebears having been notable figures in the Scottish Church; one of them, because of his theological staunchness, incurred the liberal satire of Robert Burns, and another wrote the 'History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland from the Restoration to the Revolution.' The Wilsons and the Woodrows were men of convictions, habits of study, and firm temper, qualities inherited by the man in whom the names are combined.

Woodrow Wilson had his preparatory education from private schools and private tutors in Augusta, Georgia; Columbia, South Carolina; and Wilmington, North Carolina, and was afterward a student in four colleges: Davidson, Princeton, the University of Virginia, and Johns Hopkins University. He studied under many masters, but none so strongly influenced his intellectual development as his father.

Dr. Joseph Wilson was a man of unusual force in speech and action, impatient of dulness, more impatient of loose thinking and careless speaking. He was accustomed to say that men who were slovenly in conversation could not expect to be impressive in public speech. His own private talk showed that he practised his theory. Without pedantry or self-consciousness, he spoke in words of weight which measured thoughts of value. Even his badinage was memorable. His conversation was never bookish but always revealed the man trained to think and to speak.

The point is dwelt upon because it was the discipline this man gave his son, added to the son's native capacity, that assisted that distinction in thought and speech which all persons of discrimination remark in Woodrow Wilson's utterances, public or private. It is frequently said, "There is no use in trying to argue with Woodrow Wilson—he defeats all opponents." Every man likes to do what he does well, and Woodrow Wilson may sometimes, like Dr. Johnson, "talk for victory"; but, being a busier man than Dr. Johnson, he usually talks in order to dispose of business. By supplementing his early training with the study of law, he has learned how to go to the core of a question, strip it of all remote relationships, and express his conclusions clearly and convincingly. In his earlier writings he cultivated literary style, but in later years he has written and spoken with little premeditation of phraseology. His vocabulary is large and under command, and his sense of word-values is unerring. Art has become unconscious, and he blends matter and manner as they must be blended for all finest effects in spoken or written discourse. One is occasionally struck by an unusual word, but close attention shows that Woodrow Wilson is not a word-monger but a word-master.

He passed through the freshman class in Davidson College and then went to Princeton for four years, being graduated with the class of 1879. The move was fortunate, for it gave him at an impressionable age an opportunity to understand the Northern, as well as the Southern, point of view, and prepared the way for the breadth of sympathy that has been so marked in his historical writings. Books, archives, and documents gave him his material, but first-hand understanding of both sections enabled him to write the history of the great conflict between the States in such a manner that his books have practically never been charged with sectionalism from either side. He was among the earlier young Southern men to see clearly that the South was in fact as in name a part of the Union, that the glory of its history never was to be forgotten, its secession never to be apologized for, that its great tragedy was sweetened by valor and patience, but that unless the tragedy was to be futilely prolonged the South must throw in its lot heartily with the Union. Five or six years after graduation he wrote in his first book: "Whether these sections [the East, the South, and the West] are to be harmonious or dissentient depends almost entirely upon the methods and policy of the federal government. If that government be not careful to keep within its own proper sphere, and prudent to square its policy by rules of national welfare, sectional lines must and will be known; citizens of one part of the country may look with jealousy and even with hatred upon their fellow citizens of another part; and faction must tear and dissension distract a country which Providence would bless, but which man may curse."

It was thus that the young political philosopher, born and bred in the South and educated in the North, saw that the prosperity of each section lies in the integrity of the whole.

It was, however, with no premeditation of being a historian that he went North. He remained Southern by instinct, and intended to merge his fortunes with those of the South. With this intent he studied law for a little less than two years (1879-1880) at the University of Virginia, and then practised law in Atlanta, Georgia; but after about two years he found that practical law did not satisfy his intellectual hunger. What most lawyers take for granted were the things he most wished to know, not merely what the law is, but how it came to be what it is, its origins and history. In brief, it was the philosophy of law and politics that attracted him. So in 1883 he resolved to go to Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, then entering upon its most brilliant period, the objective of young men from all over the country, avid for knowledge and the careers to which knowledge would lead. While Fellow in History at Johns Hopkins he wrote and published (1885) his first book, 'Congressional Government: A Study in American Politics.' This book drew a contrast between the theory of the Constitution and political practice under the Constitution, showed that instead of the "checks and balances" of the earlier theory there had been "a constant growth of legislative and administrative practice and a steady accretion of precedent in the management of federal affairs," and that "the center and source of all motive and of all regulative power is Congress"; pointed out the waste that results from a lack of coördination between the branches of the federal government, and a lack of Cabinet responsibility. "As at present constituted, the federal government lacks strength because its powers are divided, lacks promptness because its authorities are multiplied, lacks wieldiness because its processes are roundabout, lacks efficiency because its responsibility is indistinct and its action without competent direction." In his latest book, 'Constitutional Government in the United States' (1908), he shows how authority and responsibility have tended to center in the Executive.

On June 24, 1885, he married Ellen Louise Axson of Savannah, Georgia. How much his success has been forwarded by her sympathy and wisdom is not yet matter for public record. Three daughters were born to Mr. and Mrs. Wilson.

In 1885, Mr. Wilson began his profession of teaching as a member of the small but able faculty of Bryn Mawr College. After three years there as professor of history and political economy, he accepted a similar professorship in Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut. He remained there two years, and in 1890 was called to his alma mater, Princeton, as professor of jurisprudence and political economy. His title was changed to professor of jurisprudence in 1895, and again in 1897 to professor of jurisprudence and politics. In 1902 he was elected President of Princeton University. His academic titles, in course and honorary, have been numerous. A year after leaving Johns Hopkins (1886) he took his Ph.D. degree on examination, submitting as his thesis "Congressional Government." He has received the honorary degree of LL.D. from Wake Forest, Tulane, Johns Hopkins, Rutgers, University of Pennsylvania, Brown, and Harvard, and the honorary degree of Litt.D. from Yale.

When Dr. Wilson came to the presidency of Princeton he was known throughout the country as an author and public speaker, but he was untested as an executive officer. Men "thought him fit to govern." It remained to be seen whether or not the rest of the proverb would apply, "if only he had never tried to govern." The years have proved him. In his presidential office he has carried out the idea of leadership which he pronounced in his first book, and has held ever since, in office and out of office. A leader is responsible to his constituency, but so long as he is leader he must lead. Dr. Wilson has little pleasure in the ornamental aspect of office. He is not satisfied to be "Mr. President," and let the machine run itself. He has visions and he has the will power to realize the visions. He will argue with a man who has other views than his, but he will not argue long with a man who has so many views that he cannot see in which direction to move. He never has suffered from the scholar's paralysis of will, and he has no prolonged patience with those who are so afflicted. To get things done, and to get them done after the pattern of the vision, is his practical philosophy. He has been known to quote with approval the motto of Carlyle's 'Latter-Day Pamphlets': "'Then,' said his lordship, 'will God mend all'? 'Nay, by God, Donald, we must help him to mend it,' said the other."

When he came into office he saw that things were to be done, directly for Princeton, indirectly and at large for education in America. The air was noisy with pedagogical theories as to how young people should be taught. To President Wilson the problem seemed not so much pedagogical as human and governmental. It was, in his view, not so important what should be taught as it was that young minds and characters should grow naturally while in close contact with maturer minds. College organizations, no bad things in themselves, and the social life of the college were occupying not only the most part, but also the best part of undergraduate attention. To these things, lectures and examinations were unwelcome interruptions. In the larger colleges, at any rate, the processes of education were growing too impersonal and casual to be effective. So the now famous preceptorial system was proposed and adopted, whereby students and teachers are brought into intimate relationship, not formally as master and pupil, but informally, as friends who sit down to discuss the things of the mind.

He then went further and proposed something which seemed radical but was in reality a corollary to the preceptorial system, a complete reorganization of the University in such a way as to co-ordinate the intellectual and social life of the place, bringing into communities and daily companionship representatives of all classes and of the faculty. The proposal ran counter to the traditions of Princeton; it violated privilege (for the breaking up of self-elective clubs was necessary to the plan); it sounded a startling note of democracy to a country which was losing some of its old passion for democracy. So there was a conflict, the issue of which is, at this writing, still on the knees of the gods. But, whatever happens, Princeton never will be what it would have been without Woodrow Wilson. It will be something better. Moreover, he has made a lasting impression on American ideas and ideals of education. Men of the present and of the future will reckon with him, even when they do not agree with his views. He has brought to educational problems the mind of a statesman as well as the mind of an educator. At a time when the American college is on trial before the country, indicted for not giving any adequate preparation for the great business of citizenship, this student of affairs and man of action has pointed out broad ways by which the youth of the country may be brought up for the service of the country.

This may indicate the sterner side of Woodrow Wilson's nature, the man of convictions and resolute will. There is a very gentle side of him, known to all who come in close contact with him. Slowly the students are finding this, and to their admiration for him they add affection. They would be dull indeed if they did not catch a glimpse of the inward man in such accents as these—a passage from a recent baccalaureate address, gentle words which are the more impressive from a man whose usual habit of speech is firm and militant.

"To one deep fountain of revelation and renewal few of you, I take it for granted, have had access yet—I mean the fountain of sorrow, a fountain sweet or bitter according as it is drunk in submission or in rebellion, in love or in resentment and deep dismay. I will not tell you of these waters; if you have not tasted them, it would be futile, and some of you will understand without word of mine. I can only beg that when they are put to your lips, as they must be, you will drink of them as those who seek renewal, and know how to make of sadness a mood of enlightenment and of hope."

Of the literary style of this it is hardly necessary to speak. "This kind can come forth by nothing but by prayer and fasting," or, to speak literally, by nothing but literary gift brought under discipline. Woodrow Wilson was a faithful servant of letters until the presidency of the University so occupied his time as to give him only brief and broken hours for writing.

Since 1885, the date of the production of 'Congressional Government,' he has published the following books: 'The State,' (1869), 'Division and Reunion' (1893), 'An Old Master, and other Political Essays' (1893), 'Mere Literature and other Essays' (1896), 'George Washington' (1896), 'A History of the American People' (five volumes, 1902), 'Constitutional Government in the United States' (1908). Besides these there are many uncollected essays and addresses, published in magazines, reviews, and brochures.

In an essay entitled "The Truth of the Matter" (published in the volume called 'Mere Literature') Woodrow Wilson set forth clearly his conception of the historian's business. For Dry-as-Dust, the mere investigator, he had just that respect which all have for industry as a separate virtue; on the other hand, he calls those historians "shallow fellows" who seek the "dramatic" for its own sake. It is imagination, not that which invents but that which perceives the underlying truth of things, which the historian needs, to kindle his facts into life, to give the picture as a whole, to see the past as one who knew the past.

The value of his historical method and its application must be decided at a later time. But he who reads the histories knows how Dr. Wilson's books "recover a past age; make dead generations live again and breathe their own air." His sympathetic re-creative method is seen in its simplest form in such passages of the life of Washington as describe colonial life in Virginia, or the last days and death of the great general. When the author's father read the quiet words that describe with the calm of suppressed feeling the death of Washington, he said, "Woodrow, I am glad you let George Washington do his own dying."

The deeper-lying effects of this penetrative, imaginative method of dealing with history may be seen in his 'Division and Reunion' and his large 'History of the American People.' In these imagination and reason sit together, sympathy and judgment control each other. In such contrasts as he draws in the larger work between the democracy of Thomas Jefferson and General Jackson we see the shrewd insight into human character, the right estimate of the temper of the people, the delicate separation of supergrowth and tissue—things temporary and things destined to shape the nation. In both works, the story of the war and the events which led to it make a very human story, and an extraordinarily just estimate of men, motives, and principles. In "The Truth of the Matter" he wrote of Macaulay: "We detect the tone of the advocate, and though if we are just we must deem him honest, we cannot deem him safe." It is not the advocate but the judge who wrote the accounts of the war between the States in the two histories, a dispassionate but not a disinterested judge, one with power to understand those motives of men which create epochs, to understand them as if he had lived with these men of both sides; he sees in them soundness and frailty, faith and unfaith, touches of charlatanry and visions of statesmanship. He judges them not by the standard of the accomplished event, that futile sort of history which makes children and imbeciles of all foregone generations, but judges them in the light of the passions of their day, the obscure light in which all men work before the closed doors of the future, for only afterthought is certain. He writes as one "who understands not only men but institutions, sees clearly how the interpretations of the Constitution diverged under different economic conditions at the South and the North." It is interesting that a man so ardent and so capable of convictions could write so judicially. But the imagination, the sympathy, and the literary quality preserve the human note in all the narrative. 'Division and Reunion' is remarkable in that its compact pages contain so much of facts and dates that it can be used as a reference book, and is yet at the same time a piece of literature. Both the histories were written by a professional historian, a professional student of politics, and a professional man of letters.

Edmund Burke and Walter Bagehot have been his masters, in so far as a man of independent mind can be said to have masters; and it is noteworthy that both wrote of human government in masterful English, and were literary artists as well as political philosophers. Of both these men Woodrow Wilson has published appreciative essays in his volume of essays entitled 'Mere Literature.' This book and 'An Old Master' contain such of Mr. Wilson's essays as have been collected. Most of these essays are on the borderland between politics and literature, but in them there is more of the personal note than would have been allowable in the histories and the works on government.

One of the most notable traits of Woodrow Wilson has been a power to grow and never cease growing. When he was an undergraduate he wrote his father that he had discovered he possessed a mind. From this ingenuous statement to the present hour that mind and its concomitants, character and power, have developed steadily, with the result that he has been prepared for each new responsibility as it arose. All over the country thoughtful men are saying that he must some day be the Democratic nominee for the Presidency of the United States. He never has sought office, and office may never seek him; but it is an interesting evidence of the impression of power that this man makes, that so many who hear him speak on public affairs should reach the conclusion that this private citizen is, by nature and development, one of the fittest men in the country to fill one of the country's most responsible offices.

THE TRUTH OF THE MATTER

From 'Mere Literature, and Other Essays.' Copyright by the author and used here by permission.

'T is a pity to see how even the greatest minds will often lack the broad and catholic vision with which the just historian must look upon men and affairs. There is Carlyle, with his shrewd and seeing eye, his unmatched capacity to assess strong men and set the scenery for tragedy or intrigue, his breathless ardor for great events, his amazing flashes of insight, and his unlooked-for steady light of occasional narrative. The whole matter of what he writes is too dramatic. Surely history was not all enacted so hotly, or with so passionate a rush of men upon the stage. Its quiet scenes must have been longer, not mere pauses and interludes while the tragic parts were being made up. There is not often ordinary sunlight upon the page. The lights burn now wan, now lurid. Men are seen disquieted and turbulent, and may be heard in husky cries or rude, untimely jests. We do not recognize our own world, but seem to see another such as ours might become if peopled by like uneasy Titans. Incomparable to tell of days of storm and revolution, speaking like an oracle and familiar of destiny and fate, searching the hearts of statesmen and conquerors with an easy insight in every day of action, this peasant seer cannot give us the note of piping times of peace, or catch the tone of slow industry; watches ships come and go at the docks, hears freight-vans thunder along the iron highways of the modern world, and loaded trucks lumber heavily through the crowded city streets, with a hot disdain of commerce, prices current, the haggling of the market, the smug ease of material comfort bred in a trading age. There is here no broad and catholic vision, no wise tolerance, no various power to know, to sympathize, to interpret. The great seeing imagination of the man lacks that pure radiance in which things are seen steadily and seen whole.

It is not easy, to say truth, to find actual examples when you are constructing the ideal historian, the man with the vision and the faculty divine to see affairs justly and tell of them completely. If you are not satisfied with this passionate and intolerant seer of Chelsea, whom will you choose? Shall it be Gibbon, whom all praise, but so few read? He, at any rate, is passionless, it would appear. But who could write epochal history with passion? All hot humors of the mind must, assuredly, cool when spread at large upon so vast a surface. One must feel like a sort of minor providence in traversing that great tract of world history, and catch in spite of one's self the gait and manner of a god. This stately procession of generations moves on remote from the ordinary levels of our human sympathy. 'T is a wide view of nations and peoples and dynasties, and a world shaken by the travail of new births. There is here no scale by which to measure the historian of the sort we must look to see handle the ordinary matter of national history. The 'Decline and Fall' stands impersonal, like a monument. We shall reverence it, but we shall not imitate it.

If we look away from Gibbon, exclude Carlyle, and question Macaulay; if we put the investigators on one side as not yet historians, and the deliberately picturesque and entertaining raconteurs as not yet investigators, we naturally turn, I suppose, to such a man as John Richard Green, at once the patient scholar—who shall adequately say how nobly patient?—and the rare artist, working so like a master in the difficult stuffs of a long national history. The very life of the man is as beautiful as the moving sentences he wrote with so subtle a music in the cadence. We know whence the fine moral elevation of tone came that sounds through all the text of his great narrative. True, not everybody is satisfied with our doctor angelicus. Some doubt he is too ornate. Others are troubled that he should sometimes be inaccurate. Some are willing to use his history as a manual; while others cannot deem him satisfactory for didactic uses, hesitate how they shall characterize him, and quit the matter vaguely with saying that what he wrote is "at any rate literature." Can there be something lacking in Green, too, notwithstanding he was impartial, and looked with purged and open eyes upon the whole unbroken life of his people—notwithstanding he saw the truth and had the art and mastery to make others see it as he did, in all its breadth and multiplicity?

Perhaps even this great master of narrative lacks variety—as who does not? His method, whatever the topic, is ever the same. His sentences, his paragraphs, his chapters are pitched one and all in the same key. It is a very fine and moving key. Many an elevated strain and rich harmony commend it alike to the ear and to the imagination. It is employed with an easy mastery, and is made to serve to admiration a wide range of themes. But it is always the same key, and some themes it will not serve. An infinite variety plays through all history. Every scene has its own air and singularity. Incidents cannot all be rightly set in the narrative if all be set alike. As the scene shifts, the tone of the narrative must change; the narrator's choice of incident and his choice of words; the speed and method of his sentence, his own thought, even, and point of view. Surely his battle pages must resound with the tramp of armies and the fearful din and rush of war. In peace he must catch by turns the hum of industry, the bustle of the street, the calm of the country-side, the tone of parliamentary debate, the fancy, the ardor, the argument of poets and seers and quiet students. Snatches of song run along with sober purpose and strenuous endeavor through every nation's story. Coarse men and refined, mobs and ordered assemblies, science and mad impulse, storm and calm, are all alike ingredients of the various life. It is not all epic. There is rough comedy and brutal violence. The drama can scarce be given any strict, unbroken harmony of incident, any close logical sequence of act or nice unity of scene. To pitch it all in one key, therefore, is to mistake the significance of the infinite play of varied circumstance that makes up the yearly movement of a people's life.

It would be less than just to say that Green's pages do not reveal the variety of English life the centuries through. It is his glory, indeed, as all the world knows, to have broadened and diversified the whole scale of English history. Nowhere else within the compass of a single book can one find so many sides of the great English story displayed with so deep and just an appreciation of them all, or of the part of each in making up the whole. Green is the one man among English historians who has restored the great fabric of the nation's history where its architecture was obscure, and its details were likely to be lost or forgotten. Once more, because of him, the vast Gothic structure stands complete, its majesty and firm grace enhanced at every point by the fine tracery of its restored details.

Where so much is done, it is no doubt unreasonable to ask for more. But the very architectural symmetry of this great book imposes a limitation upon it. It is full of a certain sort of variety; but it is only the variety of a great plan's detail, not the variety of English life. The noble structure obeys its own laws rather than the laws of a people's fortunes. It is a monument conceived and reared by a consummate artist, and it wears upon its every line some part of the image it was meant to bear, of a great, complex, aspiring national existence. But, though it symbolizes, it does not contain that life. It has none of the irregularity of the actual experiences of men and communities. It explains, but it does not contain, their variety. The history of every nation has certainly a plan which the historian must see and reproduce; but he must reconstruct the people's life, not merely expound it. The scope of his method must be as great as the variety of his subject; it must change with each change of mood, respond to each varying impulse in the great process of events. No rigor of a stately style must be suffered to exclude the lively touches of humor or the rude sallies of strength that mark it everywhere. The plan of the telling must answer to the plan of the fact—must be as elastic as the topics are mobile. The matter should rule the plan, not the plan the matter.

The ideal is infinitely difficult, if, indeed, it be possible to any man not Shakespearean; but the difficulty of attaining it is often unnecessarily enhanced. Ordinarily the historian's preparation for his task is such as to make it unlikely he will perform it naturally. He goes first, with infinite and admirable labor, through all the labyrinth of document and detail that lies up and down his subject; collects masses of matter great and small, for substance, verification, illustration; piles his notes volumes high; reads far and wide upon the tracks of his matter, and makes page upon page of references; and then, thoroughly stuffed and sophisticated, turns back and begins his narrative. 'T is impossible then that he should begin naturally. He sees the end from the beginning, and all the intermediate way from beginning to end; he has made up his mind about too many things; uses his details with a too free and familiar mastery, not like one who tells a story so much as like one who dissects a cadaver. Having swept his details together beforehand, like so much scientific material, he discourses upon them like a demonstrator—thinks too little in subjection to them. They no longer make a fresh impression upon him. They are his tools, not his objects of vision.

It is not by such a process that a narrative is made vital and true. It does not do to lose the point of view of the first listener to the tale, or to rearrange the matter too much out of the order of nature. You must instruct your reader as the events themselves would have instructed him, had he been able to note them as they passed. The historian must not lose his own fresh view of the scene as it passed and changed more and more from year to year and from age to age. He must keep with the generation of which he writes, not be too quick to be wiser than they were or look back upon them in his narrative with head over shoulder. He must write of them always in the atmosphere they themselves breathed, not hastening to judge them, but striving only to realize them at every turn of the story, to make their thoughts his own, and call their lives back again, rebuilding the very stage upon which they played their parts. Bring the end of your story to mind while you set about telling its beginning, and it seems to have no parts; beginning, middle, end, are all as one—are merely like parts of a pattern which you see as a single thing stamped upon the stuff under your hand.

Try the method with the history of our own land and people. How will you begin? Will you start with a modern map and a careful topographical description of the continent? And then, having made your nineteenth-century framework for the narrative, will you ask your reader to turn back and see the seventeenth century, and those lonely ships coming in at the capes of the Chesapeake? He will never see them so long as you compel him to stand here at the end of the nineteenth century and look at them as if through a long retrospect. The attention both of the narrator and of the reader, if history is to be seen aright, must look forward, not backward. It must see with a contemporaneous eye. Let the historian, if he be wise, know no more of the history as he writes than might have been known in the age and day of which he is writing. A trifle too much knowledge will undo him. It will break the spell for his imagination. It will spoil the magic by which he may raise again the image of days that are gone. He must of course know the large lines of his story; it must lie as a whole in his mind. His very art demands that, in order that he may know and keep its proportions. But the details, the passing incidents of day and year, must come fresh into his mind, unreasoned upon as yet, untouched by theory, with their first look upon them. It is here that original documents and fresh research will serve him. He must look far and wide upon every detail of the time, see it at first hand, and paint as he looks; selecting, as the artist must, but selecting while the vision is fresh, and not from old sketches laid away in his notes—selecting from the life itself.

Let him remember that his task is radically different from the task of the investigator. The investigator must display his materials, but the historian must convey his impressions. He must stand in the presence of life, and reproduce it in his narrative; must recover a past age; make dead generations live again and breathe their own air; show them native and at home upon his page. To do this, his own impressions must be as fresh as those of an unlearned reader, his own curiosity as keen and young at every stage. It may easily be so as his reading thickens, and the atmosphere of the age comes stealthily into his thought, if only he take care to push forward the actual writing of his narrative at an equal pace with his reading, painting thus always direct from the image itself. His knowledge of the great outlines and bulks of the picture will be his sufficient guide and restraint the while, will give proportion to the individual strokes of his work. But it will not check his zest, or sophisticate his fresh recovery of the life that is in the crowding colors of the canvas.

A nineteenth-century plan laid like a standard and measure upon a seventeenth-century narrative will infallibly twist it and make it false. Lay a modern map before the first settlers at Jamestown and Plymouth, and then bid them discover and occupy the continent. With how superior a nineteenth-century wonder and pity will you see them grope, and stumble, and falter! How like children they will seem to you, and how simple their age, and ignorant! As stalwart men as you they were in fact; mayhap wiser and braver too; as fit to occupy a continent as you are to draw it upon paper. If you would know them, go back to their age; breed yourself a pioneer and woodsman; look to find the South Sea up the nearest northwest branch of the spreading river at your feet; discover and occupy the wilderness with them; dream what may be beyond the near hills, and long all day to see a sail upon the silent sea; go back to them and see them in their habit as they lived.

The picturesque writers of history have all along been right in theory; they have been wrong only in practice. It is a picture of the past we want—its express image and feature; but we want the true picture and not simply the theatrical matter—the manner of Rembrandt rather than of Rubens. All life may be pictured, but not all of life is picturesque. No great, no true historian would put false or adventitious colors into his narrative, or let a glamour rest where in fact it never was. The writers who select an incident merely because it is striking or dramatic are shallow fellows. They see only with the eye's retina, not with that deep vision whose images lie where thought and reason sit. The real drama of life is disclosed only with the whole picture; and that only the deep and fervid student will see, whose mind goes daily fresh to the details, whose narrative runs always in the authentic colors of nature, whose art it is to see, and to paint what he sees.

It is thus and only thus we shall have the truth of the matter: by art—by the most difficult of all arts; by fresh study and first-hand vision; at the mouths of men who stand in the midst of old letters and dusty documents and neglected records, not like antiquarians, but like those who see a distant country and a far-away people before their very eyes, as real, as full of life and hope and incident, as the day in which they themselves live. Let us have done with humbug and come to plain speech. The historian needs an imagination quite as much as he needs scholarship, and consummate literary art as much as candor and common honesty. Histories are written in order that the bulk of men may read and realize; and it is as bad to bungle the telling of the story as to lie, as fatal to lack a vocabulary as to lack knowledge. In no case can you do more than convey an impression, so various and complex is the matter. If you convey a false impression, what difference does it make how you convey it? In the whole process there is a nice adjustment of means to ends which only the artist can manage. There is an art of lying; there is equally an art—an infinitely more difficult art—of telling the truth.

THE SPIRIT OF LEARNING

Phi Beta Kappa Address delivered at Harvard University, July 1, 1909.

I SAID just now that I sympathized with men who said that what they wanted for their sons in college was not what they got in the classroom so much as what they got from the life and associations of the place; but I agree with them only if what is to be got in the classroom is nothing more than items of knowledge likely to be quickly lost hold of. I agree with them; but I see clearly what they are blindly feeling after. They should desire chiefly what their sons are to get out of the life and associations of the place; but that life and those associations should be freighted with things they do not now contain. The processes of life, the contagions of association, are the only things that have ever got any real or permanent hold on men's minds. These are the conducting media for every effect we seek to work on the human spirit. The undergraduate should have scholars for teachers. They should hold his attention steadily upon great tested bodies of knowledge and should insist that he make himself acquainted with them, if only for the nonce. But they will give him nothing he is likely to carry with him through life if they stop with formal instruction, however thorough or exacting they may.

make it. Their permanent effects will be wrought upon his spirit. Their teaching will follow him through life only if they reveal to him the meaning, the significance, the essential validity of what they are about, the motives which prompt it, the processes which verify it. They will rule him, not by what they know and inform him of, but by the spirit of the things they expound. And that spirit they cannot convey in any formal manner. They can convey it only atmospherically, by making their ideals tell in some way upon the whole spirit of the place.

How shall their pupils carry their spirit away with them, or the spirit of the things they teach, if beyond the door of the classroom the atmosphere will not contain it? College is a place of initiation. Its effects are atmospheric. They are wrought by impression, by association, by emulation. The voices which do not penetrate beyond the doors of the classroom are lost, are ineffectual, are void of consequence and power. No thought will obtain or live there for the transmission of which the prevailing atmosphere is a non-conducting medium. If young gentlemen get from their years at college only manliness, esprit de corps, a release of their social gifts, a training in give and take, a catholic taste in men, and the standards of true sportsmen, they have gained much, but they have not gained what a college should give them. It should give them insight into the things of the mind and of the spirit, a sense of having lived and formed their friendships amidst the gardens of the mind where grows the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, a consciousness of having taken on them the vows of true enlightenment and of having undergone the discipline, never to be shaken off, of those who seek wisdom in candour, with faithful labour and travail of spirit.

These things they cannot get from the classroom unless the spirit of the classroom is the spirit of the place as well and of its life; and that will never be until the teacher comes out of the classroom and makes himself a part of that life. Contact, companionship, familiar intercourse is the law of life for the mind. The companionships of undergraduates will never breed the spirit of learning. The circle must be widened. It must include the older men, the teachers, the men for whom life has grown more serious and to whom it has revealed more of its meanings. So long as instruction and life do not merge in our colleges, so long as what the undergraduates do and what they are taught occupy two separate, air-tight compartments in their consciousness, so long will the college be ineffectual.

Looked at from the point of view at which I stand in all that I have been saying, some of the proposals made in our day for the improvement of the college seem very strangely conceived. It has been proposed, for example, to shorten the period of general study in college to (say) two years, and let the student who has gone the distance our present sophomores have gone enter at once upon his professional studies or receive his certificate of graduation. I take it for granted that those who have formulated this proposal never really knew a sophomore in the flesh. They say, simply, that the studies of our present sophomores are as advanced as the studies of seniors were in the great days of our grandfathers and that most of our present sophomores are as old as our grandfathers were when they graduated from the pristine college we so often boast of; and I dare say that is all true enough. But what they do not know is, that our sophomore is at the age of twenty no more mature than the sophomore of that previous generation was at the age of seventeen or eighteen. The sap of manhood is rising in him but it has not yet reached his head. It is not what a man is studying that makes him a sophomore or a senior; it is the stage the college process has reached in him. A college, the American college, is not a body of studies: it is a process of development. It takes, if our observation can be trusted, at least four years for the completion of that process, and all four of those years must be college years. They cannot be school years; they cannot be combined with school years. The school process is an entirely different one. The college is a process of slow evolution from the school-boy and the school-boy's mental attitude into the man and his entirely altered view of the world. It can be accomplished only in the college environment. The environment is of the essence of the whole effect.

If you wish to create a college, therefore, and are wise, you will seek to create a life. We have allowed ourselves to grow very anxious and to feel very helpless about college athletics. They play too large a part in the life of the undergraduate, we say; and no doubt they do. There are many other things which play too large a part in that life, to the exclusion of intellectual interests and the dissipation of much excellent energy: amusements of all kinds, social preoccupations of the most absorbing sort, a multitude of activities which have nothing whatever to do with the discipline and enlightenment of the mind. But that is because they are left a free field. Life, at college, is one thing, the work of the college another, entirely separate and distinct. The life is the field that is left free for athletics not only but also for every other amusement and diversion. Studies are no part of that life, and there is no competition. Study is the work which interrupts the life, introduces an embarrassing and inconsistent element into it. The Faculty has no part in the life; it organizes the interruption, the interference.

This is not to say that there are not a great many undergraduates seriously interested in study, or that it is impossible or even difficult to make the majority of them, the large majority, pass the tests of the examinations. It is only saying that the studies do not spring out of the life of the place and are hindered by it, must resist its influence if they would flourish. I have no jealousy of athletics; they have put wholesome spirit into both the physical and the mental life of our undergraduates. There are fewer morbid boys in the new college which we know than there were in the old college which our fathers knew; and fewer prigs, too, no doubt. Athletics are indispensable to the normal life of young men, and are in themselves wholesome and delightful, besides. In another atmosphere, the atmosphere of learning, they could be easily subordinated and assimilated. The reason they cannot be now is that there is nothing to assimilate them, nothing by which they can be digested. They make their own atmosphere unmolested. There is no direct competition.

The same thing may be said, for it is true, of all the other amusements and all the social activities of the little college world. Their name is legion; they are very interesting; most of them are in themselves quite innocent and legitimate; many of them are thoroughly worth while. They now engross the attention and absorb the energies of most of the finest, most spirited, most gifted youngsters in the undergraduate body, men fit to be scholars and masters in many fields, and for whom these small things are too trivial a preparation. They would not do so if other things which would be certain to grip these very men were in competition with them, were known and spoken of and pervasive in the life of the college outside the classroom; but they are not. The field is clear for all these little activities, as it is clear for athletics. Athletics have no serious competitor except these amusements and petty engrossments: they have no serious competitor except athletics. The scholar is not in the game. He keeps modestly to his classroom and his study and must be looked up and asked questions if you would know what he is thinking about. His influence can be set going only by the deliberate effort of the undergraduate himself who looks him up and stirs him. He deplores athletics and all the other absorbing, non-academic pursuits which he sees drawing the attention of his pupils off from study and serious preparation for life, but he will not enter into competition with them. He has never dreamed of such a thing; and, to tell the truth, the life of the place is organized in such a way as to make it hardly possible for him to do so. He is therefore withdrawn and ineffectual.

It is the duty of university authorities to make of the college a society, of which the teacher will be as much, and as naturally, a member as the undergraduates. When that is done these other things will fall into their natural places, their natural relations. Young men are capable of great enthusiasms for older men whom they have learned to know in some human, unartificial way, whose quality they have tasted in unconstrained conversation, the energy and beauty of whose characters and aims they have learned to appreciate by personal contact; and such enthusiasms are often among the strongest and most lasting influences of their lives. You will not gain the affection of your pupil by anything you do for him, impersonally, in the classroom. You may gain his admiration and vague appreciation, but he will tie to you only for what you have shown him personally or given him in intimate and friendly service.

Certain I am that it is impossible to rid our colleges of these things that compete with study and drive out the spirit of learning by the simple device of legislation, in which, as Americans, we have so childish a confidence; or, at least, that, if we did succeed in driving them out, did set our house in order and sweep and garnish it, other equally distracting occupants would crowd in to take their places. For the house would be empty. There must be life as well as study. The question is, not of what are we to empty it, but with what must we fill it? We must fill it with the things of the mind and of the spirit; and that we can do by introducing into it men for whom these things are supremely interesting, the main objects of life and endeavour, teachers who will not seem pedagogues but friends, and who can by the gentle infection of friendliness make thought a general contagion. Do that; create the atmosphere and the contacts of a society made up of men young and old, mature and adolescent, serious and gay, and you will create an emulation, a saturation, a vital union of parts in a common life, in which all questions of subordination and proportion will solve themselves. So soon as the things which now dissipate and distract and dissolve our college life feel the things which should coordinate and regulate and inspire it in direct contact with them, feel their ardour and their competition, they will fall into their proper places, will become pleasures and cease to be occupations, will delight our undergraduate days but not monopolize them. They are exaggerated now because they are separated and do not exchange impulses with those greater things of whose presence they are sometimes hardly conscious.

No doubt there are many ways in which this vital association may be effected, but all wise and successful ways will have this in common, that they will abate nothing of the freedom and self-government which have so quickened and purified our colleges in these recent days of change, will have no touch of school surveillance in them. You cannot force companionships upon undergraduates, if you treat them like men. You can only create the conditions, set up the organization, which will make them natural. The scholar should not need a statute behind him. The spirit of learning should not covet the support of the spirit and organization of the nursery. It will prevail of its own grace and power if you will but give it a chance, a conducting medium, an air in which it can move and breathe freely without effort or self-consciousness. If it cannot, I, for one, am unwilling to lend it artificial assistance. It must take its chances in the competition and win on its merits, under the ordinary rules of the game of life, where the most interesting man attracts attention, the strongest personality rules, the best organized force predominates, the most admirable thing wins allegiance. We are not seeking to force a marriage between knowledge and pleasure; we are simply trying to throw them a great deal together in the confidence that they will fall in love with one another. We are seeking to expose the undergraduate when he is most susceptible to the best and most stimulating influences of the university in the hope and belief that no sensible fellow fit for a career can resist the infection.

My plea, then, is this: that we now deliberately set ourselves to make a home for the spirit of learning: that we reorganize our colleges on the lines of this simple conception, that a college is not only a body of studies but a mode of association; that its courses are only its formal side, its contacts and contagions its realities. It must become a community of scholars and pupils—a free community but a very real one, in which democracy may work its reasonable triumphs of accommodation, its vital processes of union. I am not suggesting that young men be dragooned into becoming scholars or tempted to become pedants, or have any artificial compulsion whatever put upon them, but only that they be introduced into the high society of university ideals, be exposed to the hazards of stimulating friendships, be introduced into the easy comradeships of the republic of letters. By this means the classroom itself might some day come to seem a part of life.

WILLIAM WIRT

[1772—1834]

ARMISTEAD M. DOBIE

WILLIAM WIRT was born at Bladensburg, Maryland, November 8, 1772, the youngest of the six children of Jacob and Henrietta Wirt. Young Wirt's early education was received at various private classical academies of the type that thrived in the latter part of the Eighteenth Century. Of his various schoolmasters, the Rev. James Hunt, a man of somewhat unusual culture, seems to have made the most profound impression upon him.

For two years Wirt lived in the Hunt household, in which he had access to an excellent general library. Here he was able to gratify a strong taste for reading, which, though indiscriminate and desultory, served yet to lay strong and true the foundations of a culture which was to constitute one of the most marked characteristics of the man. When the Hunt school was disbanded, in Wirt's fifteenth year, he accepted a position as tutor in the family of Benjamin Edwards. Again he was fortunate in being offered the use of a fine library. By this time he had selected the law as his profession, so toward that end, during the twenty months he spent under the Edwards' roof, he made all his reading and studies converge.

Accordingly, after a brief legal apprenticeship, in 1792, at the early age of twenty, Wirt began his professional career at Culpeper Court-House, Virginia.

In 1795 Wirt married Mildred, the daughter of Dr. George Gilmer, and removed to Pen Park, the latter's country seat in Albemarle County. This step played a wonderful part in determining his whole future. Pen Park, the typical home of a Virginia gentleman of means and education, was the meeting place of a group of men whose social brilliance was only eclipsed by their still more brilliant achievements in the varied fields of law, letters, and politics. Through Dr. Gilmer he became closely associated with three future presidents of the United States—Jefferson, Madison and Monroe. To the friendships thus formed, which continued without abatement, he owed in no small measure the political preferment which later became his.

Wirt's engaging manners, his polished and witty conversation, added to an unusually prepossessing face and figure, speedily made him a great social favorite. Indeed, the gay social life exercised so strong a fascination for him that for a time it threatened seriously to wean him from more serious pursuits. Perceiving, however, a growing tendency among many of his neighbors to regard him as a fascinating companion rather than as an ambitious lawyer, he realized his peril in time to forsake the primrose path, in order to devote himself to the labors of his profession. His practice and reputation then grew apace. After the death of his wife, in 1799, he accepted the position of Clerk of the Virginia House of Delegates—at that time an office of no inconsiderable dignity. This he held until 1802, when, at the early age of twenty-nine, he was appointed by the Legislature Chancellor of the Eastern District of Virginia.

The industry and ability with which he presided over his court, whose jurisdiction frequently involved important interests, added no little to his already considerable renown. Finding his salary inadequate after his marriage (his second wife being Elizabeth Gamble), he resigned the Chancellorship and removed, at the instance of Mr. Tazewell, to Norfolk, where he resumed the practice of the law, remaining there until 1806, when, desiring a wider field for his talents, he again took up his residence in Richmond. Up to this time Wirt's fame, though secure and steadily increasing, had been largely confined to the bounds of his adopted State. But in 1807 occurred an event which afforded him the opportunity for which he had long been seeking and raised him at a single bound to the front rank of American advocates. This event was the trial of Aaron Burr. The heinousness of the crime charged, the prominence of the defendant, the eminence of the presiding judge (Chief Justice Marshall) and of the counsel on both sides marked the occasion as one of tremendous political and dramatic import.

At the instance of President Jefferson, Wirt was retained to aid the United States Attorney in the prosecution. His principal speech, occupying more than four hours in its delivery, extended his fame throughout the entire length and breadth of the land. That part of it describing the entry of Burr into the home of Blennerhassett is second in popularity for schoolboy declamation only to Patrick Henry's "Give me liberty or give me death."

In 1808 Wirt was elected a member of the Virginia House of Delegates. Though taking a prominent part in the deliberations of that body, he soon resumed his law practice, receiving in 1816 from President Madison the appointment as United States District Attorney. In the following year President Monroe appointed him to the high office of Attorney-general of the United States.

Wirt held this office during the Administrations of Monroe and the younger Adams, for twelve years, longer than it has ever been held by any other man. His tenure of this office, which brought him into contact with the keenest legal minds of his time, brought to him richer laurels than he had heretofore won. Hardly any of his predecessors in this office had lived in Washington, nor do they seem to have been regarded as members of the Cabinet, but rather as mere legal advisers to the Administration. None of them had left behind any written or printed opinions or precedents. When Wirt retired from the office, the Attorney-general ranked fully as a Cabinet officer both in dignity and importance. He first preserved in print all his official opinions (of which there were a great many), thereby establishing a precedent which has since been scrupulously followed. The opinions of the Attorney-general relate to matters of prime importance to the country; they involve the most delicate and difficult questions of constitutional and international law; they accomplish much in making smooth the always uncertain path of the occupants of that office; and finally they form an excellent collection of materials for writing the constitutional and legal history of the country.

Harvard conferred on Wirt the degree of Doctor of Laws in 1824. In 1826, while Jefferson was Rector of the University of Virginia, and Madison a member of its governing body, Wirt was appointed President* of the University and Professor of Law; but he declined the offer, preferring to serve out his term as Attorney-general. At the close of Adams's Administration, Wirt removed to Baltimore, where he had little trouble in soon building up an extensive law practice.

In this day and generation it seems strange that a political party should be based on overt opposition to the institution of Masonry, but such was the case in 1832, when the anti-Masonic party offered to Wirt, then sixty years old, the nomination for President of the United States. He accepted it, and in the election that ensued actually received the seven electoral votes of the State of Vermont as well as a popular vote of 33,108.

While in Washington, attending the term of the United States Supreme Court, Wirt died, February 18, 1834. The announcement of his death was received throughout the entire nation with unaffected sorrow. The funeral was attended by the President and Vice-president of the United States, the Diplomatic Corps and the Supreme Court; while both houses of Congress adjourned—an honor which had never before been accorded save to deceased members of Congress or the Senate.

Of Wirt's personal charm mention has already been made. He won and held without compromise the friendship of the really great men of his day. With the masses, he was little short of an idol. Possessed of unusual social graces, courteous to a marked degree, he embodied the highest virtues of the Colonial gentleman with none of his vices. In conversation he was quick, resourceful in classic allusions, forceful, but never tedious or prosaic. He seems, by almost unerring instinct, to have escaped the political animosities of his age, dying, as he had lived, with no bitter enemies to assail his name.

He was religious without being a bigot, exemplifying his beliefs in all the varied activities of his life. Secure in a calm, serene faith, he yielded to none in his love of friends, family, country, or God.

The fame of Wirt as a literary man rests chiefly on 'The Letters of a British Spy,' contributed to the Richmond Argus in 1803, 'The Old Bachelor,' published in 1812, and 'The Life of Patrick Henry,' published in 1817.

'The Letters of a British Spy,' written at a time when American literature was at a low ebb, achieved an immediate and wonderful popularity. They purport to be letters written by an English traveler in Virginia to a British Member of Parliament. The book contains some glowing sketches of great men of that period, some scientific observations of little value, together with a brief discussion of various kinds of eloquence. The most popular sketch was the letter, of real literary excellence, dealing with The Blind Preacher. The work is chiefly remembered now on account of its delineation of the life and people of that region and period; or as a welcome oasis in the then arid desert of American literature.

'The Old Bachelor' contains a series of essays in the Addisonian manner. Wirt was the chief author, Dabney Carr, George Tucker and others also being contributors. Wirt's contributions were marked by graceful literary form, subtle humor, and the play of a nimble fancy. In spite of the encomiums of Mr. Kennedy, however, the book contains hardly more than the germ of literary greatness.

The best known of his works is his 'Life of Patrick Henry.' Wirt never had seen the great orator, but gathered his material at first hand from many who had heard him and to whom Henry was almost a god. The narrative is forceful and pleasing, though florid, and at times inaccurate. Wirt lacked historical perspective, with the result that he was extravagantly eulogistic. The Henry of his pages lived rather in the perfervid imagination of his biographer than in the stern realities of actual fact. Still, the work is valuable as the only contemporary life of the great orator, remaining after the lapse of years one of the most popular of American biographies. Wirt's literary labors were those of prophecy and promise, rather than of fulfilment. Literature was to him never more than an avocation to which he gave only his leisure hours. His literary abilities were brilliant but not solid, his imagination was prolific rather than discriminating; his fancy luxuriant and creative rather than chaste and correct.

It is upon his career as a lawyer that Wirt's fame must ultimately rest. Few men more than he realized how jealous a mistress the law is; and single-minded devotion to the high ideals of his profession was ever his most marked characteristic; to that end he devoted his early reading. He never accepted public office save in the direct line of his professional career.

In the term of the United States Supreme Court of 1819 two cases were decided which are easily among the ten most important cases ever passed upon by that great court. In each of them Wirt materially increased his national reputation as a lawyer. The first of these was McCulloch v. The State of Maryland, 4 Wheaton 316; the second, The Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheaton 518.

In McCulloch v. Maryland, the question of the constitutionality of the Act creating the United States Bank was first presented to the Supreme Court. Associated with Wirt, for the plaintiff, were Webster and Pinkney; against him, for the defendant, were Martin, Jones, and Hopkinson. Surely a marvelous array of counsel! The argument of Wirt was in every respect worthy of the cause and the best traditions of the Court. His contention was upheld by the Court, and the constitutionality of the Bank sustained.

The Dartmouth College case was even more famous. Wirt, with Mr. Holmes as his associate, was opposed by Webster and Hopkinson. His argument in this case was so overshadowed by that of Webster, who, pleading for his own alma mater, made perhaps the ablest legal argument of his career, that great injustice has been done to Wirt's conduct of the case. Webster was successful and the principle was fastened on our jurisprudence that the charter of a private corporation is a contract within the meaning of that clause of the United States Constitution which prohibits any state from making any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

Besides the Burr trial, the other best known cases of Wirt's career are Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheaton 1, in which the Supreme Court, following Wirt, held as unconstitutional and void the acts of the New York Legislature giving exclusive rights of navigation in the waters of that State to Livingston and Fulton; The Cherokee Nation v. The State of Georgia, 5 Peters 1, decided against the Indians, represented by Wirt, on the ground of lack of jurisdiction; and the impeachment of Judge Peck before the United States Senate, in which he triumphantly secured his client's acquittal.

The long list of cases in which Wirt while Attorney-general appeared before the Supreme Court, extending over twelve volumes of the official reports (from 3rd Wheaton to 2nd Peters) placed him in the forefront of the lawyers of his day—the Golden Period of the American Bar. Certainly his conduct of that high office has never been surpassed.

Wirt's earlier speeches are characterized by florid imagery, by extravagant flights of fancy, and by beauty more ornate than the canons of oratory permit. This fault, in a large measure, he subsequently overcame. The orator's spirit was his, and, added to a commanding presence, a captivating manner, and a voice of unusual charm, gave him the complete mastery of an audience. In the presentation of a case, he never allowed himself to be led from the vital question at issue. By his clear and keen powers of analysis, by his ability to make close distinctions, by his success in intuitively anticipating an adversary's methods of attack, he proved himself in argument the peer of the master minds of his day. His speeches were carefully prepared, but always delivered with missionary zeal and fervor. His words were carefully chosen, while his sentences made a poetic appeal to the ear by the rhythmic melody of their cadences. Wirt's speeches were not of the bold, abrupt, strong and rugged type—the feliciter audax of the ancients; but for sheer beauty of form, for magic of word-painting, for graceful and varied imagery, for brilliant and impelling eloquence, they have no superiors in the field of American oratory.

He seems to have made very few occasional addresses—a type of speaking for which his gifts were singularly adapted. On two occasions, however, his discourses have been repeatedly pronounced among the best of their kind. His eulogy of Adams and Jefferson, who both died on July 4, 1826, pronounced in the Hall of Representatives at Washington, has been called "the best which this remarkable coincidence called forth." In 1830 he delivered an address of marvelous power and dignity before the students of Rutgers College, which was not only republished in England, but, by translation into both French and German, gained a wide European circulation.

Primarily a lawyer, true to the highest ideals of a lofty profession, an author who captivated the literary taste of his generation, a public official whose record never has been assailed, the ablest American Attorney-general, William Wirt will safely be remembered among those who deserve well of the State.

PATRICK HENRY IN "THE PARSON'S CASE"

From 'Life of Patrick Henry.'

. . . Soon after the opening of the court, the cause was called. It stood on a writ of inquiry of damages, no plea having been entered by the defendants since the judgment on the demurrer. The array before Mr. Henry's eyes was now most fearful. On the bench sat more than twenty clergymen, the most learned men in the colony, and the most capable, as well as the severest, critics before whom it was possible for him to have made his début. The court-house was crowded with an overwhelming multitude, and surrounded with an immense and anxious throng, who, not finding room to enter, were endeavoring to listen without, in the deepest attention. But there was something still more awfully disconcerting than all this; for in the chair of the presiding magistrate sat no other person than his own father. Mr. Lyons opened the cause very briefly: in the way of argument he did nothing more than explain to the jury, that the decision upon the demurrer had put the act of 1758 entirely out of the way, and left the law of 1748 as the only standard of their damages; he then concluded with a highly-wrought eulogium on the benevolence of the clergy. And now came on the first trial of Patrick Henry's strength. No one had ever heard him speak, and curiosity was on tiptoe. He rose very awkwardly, and faltered much in his exordium. The people hung their heads at so unpromising a commencement; the clergy were observed to exchange sly looks with each other; and his father is described as having almost sunk with confusion from his seat. But these feelings were of short duration, and soon gave place to others, of a very different character. For now were those wonderful faculties which he possessed, for the first time, developed; and now was first witnessed that mysterious and almost supernatural transformation of appearance, which the fire of his own eloquence never failed to work in him. For as his mind rolled along, and began to glow from its own action, all the exuviae of the clown seemed to shed themselves spontaneously. His attitude, by degrees, became erect and lofty. The spirit of his genius awakened all his features. His countenance shone with a nobleness and grandeur which it had never before exhibited. There was a lightning in his eyes which seemed to rive the spectator. His action became graceful, bold, and commanding; and in the tones of his voice, but more especially in his emphasis, there was a peculiar charm, a magic, of which any one who ever heard him will speak as soon as he is named, but of which no one can give any adequate description. They can only say that it struck upon the ear and upon the heart, in a manner which language cannot tell. Add to all these, his wonder-working fancy, and the peculiar phraseology in which he clothed its images; for he painted to the heart with a force that almost petrified it. In the language of those who heard him on this occasion, "he made their blood run cold, and their hair to rise on end."

It will not be difficult for any one who ever heard this most extraordinary man, to believe the whole account of this transaction, which is given by his surviving hearers; and from their account, the court-house of Hanover county must have exhibited, on this occasion, a scene as picturesque, as has been ever witnessed in real life. They say that the people, whose countenances had fallen as he arose, had heard but a very few sentences before they began to look up; then to look at each other with surprise, as if doubting the evidence of their own senses; then, attracted by some strong gesture, struck by some majestic attitude, fascinated by the spell of his eye, the charm of his emphasis, and the varied and commanding expression of his countenance, they could look away no more. In less than twenty minutes, they might be seen in every part of the house, on every bench, in every window, stooping forward from their stands, in deathlike silence; their features fixed in amazement and awe; all their senses listening and riveted upon the speaker, as if to catch the last strain of some heavenly visitant. The mockery of the clergy was soon turned into alarm; their triumph into confusion and despair; and at one burst of his rapid and overwhelming invective, they fled from the bench in precipitation and terror. As for the father, such was his surprise, such his amazement, such his rapture, that, forgetting where he was, and the character which he was filling, tears of ecstasy streamed down his cheeks, without the power or inclination to repress them.

The jury seem to have been so completely bewildered, that they lost sight, not only of the act of 1748, but that of 1758 also; for thoughtless even of the admitted right of the plaintiff, they had scarcely left the bar, when they returned with a verdict of one penny damages. A motion was made for a new trial; but the court, too, had now lost the equipoise of their judgment, and overruled the motion by a unanimous vote. The verdict and judgment overruling the motion, were followed by redoubled acclamations, from within and without the house. The people, who had with difficulty kept their hands off their champion, from the moment of closing his harangue, no sooner saw the fate of the cause finally sealed, than they seized him at the bar, and in spite of his own exertions, and the continued cry of "order" from the sheriffs and the court, they bore him out of the court-house, and raising him on their shoulders, carried him about the yard, in a kind of electioneering triumph.

BLANNERHASSETT'S HOME

From a Speech against Aaron Burr.

. . . Who is Blennerhassett? A native of Ireland, a man of letters, who fled from the storms of his own country to find quiet in ours. His history shows that war is not the natural element of his mind. If it had been, he never would have exchanged Ireland for America. So far is an army from furnishing the society natural and proper to Mr. Blennerhassett's character, that on his arrival in America he retired even from the population of the Atlantic States, and sought quiet and solitude in the bosom of our western forests. But he carried with him taste, and science, and wealth; and lo, the desert smiled! Possessing himself of a beautiful island in the Ohio, he rears upon it a palace, and decorates it with every romantic embellishment of fancy. A shrubbery, that Shenstone might have envied, blooms around him. Music, that might have charmed Calypso and her nymphs, is his. An extensive library spreads its treasures before him. A philosophical apparatus offers to him all the secrets and mysteries of nature. Peace, tranquillity, and innocence shed their mingled delights around him. And to crown the enchantment of the scene, a wife, who is said to be lovely even beyond her sex, and graced with every accomplishment that can render it irresistible, had blest him with her love and made him the father of several children. The evidence would convince you that this is but a faint picture of the real life. In the midst of all this peace, this innocent simplicity, and this tranquillity, this feast of the mind, this pure banquet of the heart, the destroyer comes; he comes to change this paradise into a hell. Yet the flowers do not wither at his approach. No monitory shuddering through the bosom of their unfortunate possessor warns him of the ruin that is coming upon him. A stranger presents himself. Introduced to their civilities by the high rank which he had lately held in his country, he soon finds his way to their hearts by the dignity and elegance of his demeanour, the light and beauty of his conversation, and the seductive and fascinating power of his address. The conquest was not difficult. Innocence is ever simple and credulous. Conscious of no design itself, it suspects none in others. It wears no guard before its breast. Every door and portal and avenue of the heart is thrown open, and all who choose it enter. Such was the state of Eden when the serpent entered its bowers. The prisoner, in a more engaging form, winding himself into the open and unpractised heart of the unfortunate Blennerhassett, found but little difficulty in changing the native character of that heart and the objects of its affection. By degrees he infuses into it the poison of his own ambition. He breathes into it the fire of his own courage; a daring and desperate thirst for glory; an ardour panting for great enterprises, for all the storms and bustle and hurricane of life. In a short time the whole man is changed, and every object of his former delight is relinquished. No more he enjoys the tranquil scene; it has become flat and insipid to his taste. His books are abandoned. His retort and crucible are thrown aside. His shrubbery blooms and breathes its fragrance upon the air in vain; he likes it not. His ear no longer drinks the rich melody of music; it longs for the trumpet's clangour and the cannon's roar. Even the prattle of his babes, once so sweet, no longer affects him; and the angel smile of his wife, which hitherto touched his bosom with ecstasy so unspeakable, is now unseen and unfelt. Greater objects have taken possession of his soul. His imagination has been dazzled by visions of diadems, of stars and garters and titles of nobility. He has been taught to burn with restless emulation at the names of great heroes and conquerors. His enchanted island is destined soon to relapse into a wilderness; and in a few months we find the beautiful and tender partner of his bosom, whom he lately "permitted not the winds of summer to visit too roughly," we find her shivering at midnight on the winter banks of the Ohio and mingling her tears with the torrents that froze as they fell. Yet this unfortunate man, thus deluded from his interest and his happiness, thus seduced from the paths of innocence and peace, thus confounded in the toils that were deliberately spread for him, and overwhelmed by the mastering spirit and genius of another—this man, thus ruined and undone, and made to play a subordinate part in this grand drama of guilt and treason, this man is to be called the principal offender, while he by whom he was thus plunged into misery is comparatively innocent, a mere accessory! Is this reason? Is it law? Is it humanity? Sir, neither the human heart nor the human understanding will bear a perversion so monstrous and absurd! so shocking to the soul! so revolting to reason! Let Aaron Burr, then, not shrink from the high destination which he has courted, and having already ruined Blennerhassett in fortune, character, and happiness for ever, let him not attempt to finish the tragedy by thrusting that ill-fated man between himself and punishment!

ADAMS AND JEFFERSON

From 'The Old Bachelor.'

OF "the chief of the Argonauts," as Mr. Jefferson so classically and so happily styled his illustrious friend of the North, it is my misfortune to be able to speak only by report. But every representation concurs, in drawing the same pleasing and affecting picture of the Roman simplicity in which that Father of his Country lived; of the frank, warm, cordial, and elegant reception that he gave to all who approached him; of the interesting kindness with which he disbursed the golden treasures of his experience, and shed around him the rays of his descending sun. His conversation was rich in anecdote and characters of the times that were past; rich in political and moral instruction; full of that best of wisdom, which is learnt from real life, and flowing from his heart with that warm and honest frankness, that fervour of feeling and force of diction, which so strikingly distinguished him in the meridian of his life. Many of us heard that simple and touching account given of a parting scene with him, by one of our eloquent divines: When he rose up from that little couch behind the door, on which he was wont to rest his aged and weary limbs, and with his silver locks hanging on each side of his honest face, stretched forth that pure hand, which was never soiled even by a suspicion, and gave his kind and parting benediction. Such was the blissful and honoured retirement of the sage of Quincy. Happy the life, which, verging upon a century, had met with but one serious political disappointment! and for that, too, he had lived to receive a golden atonement. "Even there where he had garnered up his heart."

Let us now turn for a moment to the patriot of the South. The Roman moralist, in that great work which he has left for the government of man in all the offices of life, has descended to prescribe the kind of habitation in which an honoured and distinguished man should dwell. It should not, he says, be small, and mean, and sordid: nor, on the other hand, extended with profuse and wanton extravagance. It should be large enough to receive and accommodate the visitors which such a man never fails to attract, and suited in its ornaments, as well as its dimensions, to the character and fortune of the individual. Monticello has now lost its great charm. Those of you who have not already visited it, will not be very apt to visit it hereafter: and, from the feelings which you cherish for its departed owner, I persuade myself that you will not be displeased with a brief and rapid sketch of that abode of domestic bliss, that temple of science. Nor is it, indeed, foreign to the express purpose of this meeting, which, in looking to "his life and character," naturally embraces his home and his domestic habits. Can any thing be indifferent to us, which was so dear to him, and which was a subject of such just admiration to the hundreds and thousands that were continually resorting to it, as to an object of pious pilgrimage?

The Mansion House at Monticello was built and furnished in the days of his prosperity. In its dimensions, its architecture, its arrangements and ornaments, it is such a one as became the character and fortune of the man. It stands upon an elliptic plain, formed by cutting down the apex of a mountain; and, on the west, stretching away to the north and the south, it commands a view of the Blue Ridge for a hundred and fifty miles, and brings under the eye one of the boldest and most beautiful horizons in the world; while, on the east, it presents an extent of prospect bounded only by the spherical form of the earth, in which nature seems to sleep in eternal repose, as if to form one of her finest contrasts with the rude and rolling grandeur on the west. In the wide prospect, and scattered to the north and south, are several detached mountains, which contribute to animate and diversify this enchanting landscape; and among them, to the south, Willis's Mountain, which is so interestingly depicted in his Notes. From this summit, the Philosopher was wont to enjoy that spectacle, among the sublimest of Nature's operations, the looming of the distant mountains; and to watch the motions of the planets, and the greater revolution of the celestial sphere. From this summit, too, the patriot could look down, with uninterrupted vision, upon the wide expanse of the world around, for which he considered himself born; and upward, to the open and vaulted heavens which he seemed to approach, as if to keep him continually in mind of his high responsibility. It is indeed a prospect in which you see and feel, at once, that nothing mean or little could live. It is a scene fit to nourish those great and high-souled principles which formed the elements of his character, and was a most noble and appropriate post for such a sentinel over the rights and liberties of man.

Approaching the house on the east, the visiter instinctively paused, to cast around one thrilling glance at this magnificent panorama; and then passed to the vestibule, where, if he had not been previously informed, he would immediately perceive that he was entering the house of no common man. In the spacious and lofty hall which opens before him, he marks no tawdry and unmeaning ornaments; but before, on the right, on the left, all around, the eye is struck and gratified with objects of science and taste, so classed and arranged as to produce their finest effect. On one side, specimens of sculpture set out, in such order, as to exhibit at a coup d'œil, the historical progress of that art; from the first rude attempts of the aborigines of our country, up to that exquisite and finished bust of the great patriot himself, from the master hand of Caracci. On the other side, the visiter sees displayed a vast collection of specimens of Indian art, their paintings, weapons, ornaments, and manufactures; on another, an array of the fossil productions of our country, mineral and animal; the polished remains of those colossal monsters that once trod our forests, and are no more; and a variegated display of the branching honours of those "monarchs of the waste," that still people the wilds of the American Continent.

From this hall he was ushered into a noble saloon, from which the glorious landscape of the west again bursts upon his view; and which, within, is hung thick around with the finest productions of the pencil—historical paintings of the most striking subjects from all countries, and all ages; the portraits of distinguished men and patriots, both of Europe and America, and medallions and engravings in endless profusion.

While the visiter was yet lost in the contemplation of these treasures of the arts and sciences, he was startled by the approach of a strong and sprightly step, and turning with instinctive reverence to the door of entrance, he was met by the tall, and animated, and stately figure of the patriot himself—his countenance beaming with intelligence and benignity, and his outstretched hand, with its strong and cordial pressure, confirming the courteous welcome of his lips. And then came that charm of manner and conversation that passes all description—so cheerful—so unassuming—so free, and easy, and frank, and kind, and gay—that even the young, and overawed, and embarrassed visitor at once forgot his fears, and felt himself by the side of an old and familiar friend.

THE BLIND PREACHER

From 'The British Spy.'

It was one Sunday, as I travelled through the county of Orange, that my eye was caught by a cluster of horses tied near a ruinous, old, wooden house, in the forest, not far from the roadside. Having frequently seen such objects before, in traveling through these states, I had no difficulty in understanding that this was a place of religious worship.

Devotion alone should have stopped me, to join in the duties of the congregation; but I must confess, that curiosity, to hear the preacher of such a wilderness, was not the least of my motives. On entering I was struck with his preternatural appearance; he was a tall and very spare old man; his head, which was covered with a white linen cap, his shrivelled hands, and his voice, were all shaking under the influence of a palsy; and a few moments ascertained to me that he was perfectly blind.

The first emotions which touched my breast, were those of mingled pity and veneration. But ah! sacred God! how soon were all my feelings changed! The lips of Plato were never more worthy of a prognostic swarm of bees, than were the lips of this holy man! It was a day of the administration of the sacrament; and his subject, of course, was the passion of our Saviour. I had heard the subject handled a thousand times: I had thought it exhausted long ago. Little did I suppose, that in the wild woods of America, I was to meet with a man whose eloquence would give to this topic a new and more sublime pathos, than I had ever before witnessed.

As he descended from the pulpit, to distribute the mystic symbols, there was a peculiar, a more than human solemnity in his air and manner which made my blood run cold, and my whole frame shiver.

He then drew a picture of the sufferings of our Saviour; His trial before Pilate; His ascent up Calvary; His crucifixion, and His death. I knew the whole history; but never, until then, had I heard the circumstances so selected, so arranged, so coloured! It was all new: and I seemed to have heard it for the first time in my life. His enunciation was so deliberate, that his voice trembled on every syllable; and every heart in the assembly trembled in unison. His peculiar phrases had that force of description that the original scene appeared to be, at that moment, acting before our eyes. We saw the very faces of the Jews: the staring, frightful distortions of malice and rage. We saw the buffet; my soul kindled with a flame of indignation; and my hands were involuntarily and convulsively clinched.

But when he came to touch on the patience, the forgiving meekness of our Saviour; when he drew, to the life, his blessed eyes streaming in tears to heaven; his voice breathing to God, a soft and gentle prayer of pardon on his enemies, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do"—the voice of the preacher, which had all along faltered, grew fainter and fainter, until his utterance being entirely obstructed by the force of his feelings, he raised his handkerchief to his eyes, and burst into a loud and irrepressible flood of grief. The effect is inconceivable. The whole house resounded with the mingled groans, and sobs, and shrieks of the congregation.

It was some time before the tumult had subsided, so far as to permit him to proceed. Indeed, judging by the usual, but fallacious standard of my own weakness, I began to be very uneasy for the situation of the preacher. For I could not conceive, how he would be able to let his audience down from the height to which he had wound them, without impairing the solemnity and dignity of his subject, or perhaps shocking them by the abruptness of the fall. But—no; the descent was as beautiful and sublime, as the elevation had been rapid and enthusiastic.

The first sentence, with which he broke the awful silence was a quotation from Rousseau, "Socrates died like a philosopher, but Jesus Christ, like a God!"

I despair of giving you any idea of the effect produced by this short sentence, unless you could perfectly conceive the whole manner of the man, as well as the peculiar crisis in the discourse. Never before, did I completely understand what Demosthenes meant by laying such stress on delivery. You are to bring before you the venerable figure of the preacher; his blindness, constantly recalling to your recollection old Homer, Ossian and Milton, and associating with his performance, the melancholy grandeur of their geniuses; you are to imagine that you hear his slow, solemn, well-accented enunciation, and his voice of affecting, trembling melody; you are to remember the pitch of passion and enthusiasm to which the congregation were raised; and then, the few minutes of portentous, death-like silence which reigned throughout the house; the preacher removing his white handkerchief from his aged face, (even yet wet from the recent torrent of his tears,) and slowly stretching forth the palsied hand which holds it, begins the sentence, "Socrates died like a philosopher"—then pausing, raising his other hand, pressing them both clasped together, with warmth and energy to his breast, lifting his "sightless balls" to heaven, and pouring his whole soul into his tremulous voice—"but Jesus Christ—like a God!" If he had been indeed and in truth an angel of light, the effect could scarcely have been more divine.

Whatever I had been able to conceive of the sublimity of Massillon, or the force of Bourdaloue, had fallen far short of the power which I felt from the delivery of this simple sentence. The blood, which just before had rushed in a hurricane upon my brain, and, in the violence and agony of my feelings, had held my whole system in suspense, now ran back into my heart, with a sensation which I cannot describe—a kind of shuddering delicious horror! The paroxysm of blended pity and indignation, to which I had been transported, subsided into the deepest self-abasement, humility and adoration. I had just been lacerated and dissolved by sympathy, for our Saviour as a fellow creature; but now, with fear and trembling, I adored Him as—"a God!"

If this description give you the impression that this incomparable minister had any thing of shallow, theatrical trick in his manner, it does him great injustice. I have never seen, in any other orator, such a union of simplicity and majesty. He has not a gesture, an attitude or an accent, to which he does not seem forced, by the sentiment which he is expressing. His mind is too serious, too earnest, too solicitous, and, at the same time, too dignified, to stoop to artifice. Although as far removed from ostentation as a man can be, yet it is clear from the train, the style and substance of his thoughts, that he is, not only a very polite scholar, but a man of extensive and profound erudition. I was forcibly struck with a short, yet beautiful character which he drew of our learned and amiable countryman, Sir Robert Boyle: he spoke of him, as if "his noble mind had, even before death, divested herself of all influence from his frail tabernacle of flesh;" and called him, in his peculiarly emphatic and impressive manner, "a pure intelligence: the link between men and angels."

This man has been before my imagination almost ever since. A thousand times, as I rode along, I dropped the reins of my bridle, stretched forth my hand, and tried to imitate his quotation from Rousseau; a thousand times I abandoned the attempt in despair, and felt persuaded that his peculiar manner and power arose from an energy of soul which nature could give, but which no human being could justly copy. In short, he seems to be altogether a being of a former age, or of a totally different nature from the rest of men. As I recall, at this moment, several of his awfully striking attitudes, the chilling tide, with which my blood begins to pour along my arteries, reminds me of the emotions produced by the first sight of Gray's introductory picture of his bard:

On a rock, whose haughty brow,
Frowns o'er old Conway's foaming flood,
Robed in the sable garb of wo,
With haggard eyes the poet stood:
(Loose his beard and hoary hair
Streamed, like a meteor, to the troubled air:)
And with a poet's hand and prophet's fire,
Struck the deep sorrows of his lyre.

HENRY A. WISE

[1806—1876]

EDWARD S. JOYNES

HENRY ALEXANDER WISE was born in Accomack County, Virginia, December 3, 1806, of mixed English and Scotch ancestry distinguished for talents and patriotism. At twelve years of age, he was sent to Margaret Academy, in Accomack, and in 1822 he entered Washington College, Pennsylvania, where he was graduated with honors, and especially with oratorical distinction, in 1825. In both of these schools he was trained in the rigid classical curriculum of that day, for which he always retained the deepest reverence (see his tribute to "The Humanities" in his 'Seven Decades of the Union'). He then went to the celebrated law school of Judge Henry St. George Tucker, at Winchester, Virginia. At Washington College he met the lady who became his first wife, Miss Ann Jennings, daughter of the Rev. Obadiah Jennings. At Washington College, also, he first saw General Andrew Jackson, and felt the first enthusiasm of hero worship.

Returning from the law school he began the practice of law in Accomack. But soon the "lure of love" called him, and in 1828 he removed to Nashville, where Dr. Jennings was then living, and was there married. The honeymoon was spent at "The Hermitage," of which, as well as of the journey in a buggy from Accomack to Nashville, a charming description is preserved in 'The Seven Decades.' But the love of home proved too strong, and in 1830 he returned to Accomack. In 1833 he was elected to Congress as a Jackson Democrat, opposed to nullification. The leading men of the district, almost without exception, were "Nullifiers," and the success of this young candidate was, under the circumstances, a remarkable personal triumph.

From this time the life of Mr. Wise belongs to the public history of the country. His career in Congress, from 1833 to 1844, was brilliant and influential. He was especially distinguished as the chief antagonist of the "Old Man Eloquent," John Quincy Adams, in defence of Southern rights. Alienated from the policy of Jackson, he became a leader in the opposition during Van Buren's administration. In the great campaign of 1840 his services were sought in all parts of the country, and along with his illustrious friend, Sargent S. Prentiss, he made a memorable canvass. He was the author of the sentiment "The Union of the Whigs for the sake of the Union," which became the rallying cry of the party. After the death of President Harrison he was President Tyler's closest friend and adviser, and was the leader of the famous "Corporal's Guard" in Congress, which, though not numerous, was so distinguished in the political struggles of that excited time.

Mr. Wise's first wife died in 1837. In November, 1840, he was married to Miss Sarah Sergeant, of Philadelphia, daughter of the distinguished John Sergeant. In 1844 he was appointed Minister to Brazil. In this service he distinguished himself by strenuous opposition to the slave trade. His parting letter to his constituents, on resigning his seat in Congress, was an earnest appeal in behalf of free schools. On this subject Mr. Wise was far in advance of the public sentiment of that day in Virginia.

Returning from Brazil in 1847, Mr. Wise resumed the practice of law in Accomack, but was soon called again into public life as a candidate for the Virginia Convention of 1850. Here he won a signal triumph. Though differing with his constituents on the question of the basis of taxation and suffrage, he was elected over the strongest opposition. In this Convention, which included the foremost men of Virginia, he was the most prominent figure, and succeeded in securing most of the great objects for which he contended. One result of this work was his nomination as Democratic candidate for Governor in 1855.

Here we come to the most brilliant portion of Mr. Wise's brilliant career. His canvass against "Know-Nothingism" is one of the most memorable in the history of Virginia politics. With a courage and endurance unsurpassed—with an eloquence indescribable in power and effect—he traversed the State from the ocean to the Ohio, and stayed the rising tide of a political movement which had seemed destined to sweep the country. The result was a most memorable triumph of personality, of conviction, and of eloquence in public affairs, and it gave to Mr. Wise the highest national fame.

We have no space to recount the administration of Mr. Wise as governor. It was a critical time. Governor Wise was found equal to every occasion. In the affair of the John Brown raid his conduct won not only the approval of Virginia but the admiration of the country. He saw the coming shadow of war. He strove for peace and union, yet earnestly urged preparation for the worst.

The second Mrs. Wise had died in 1850. In 1853 Mr. Wise married Miss Mary Lyons of Richmond. His life was richly blessed and deeply influenced by the love of three noble women.

On the expiration of his term as Governor, Mr. Wise removed to Princess Anne County. But crowding events left him little time for retirement. On the election of Lincoln he foresaw the coming struggle. He was opposed to secession, but in favor of "fighting in the Union." As a member of the Virginia Convention he urged this view in vain, but finally voted for secession, after President Lincoln's call for troops. What might have been the result of Mr. Wise's policy it is now useless to speculate; but he died in the belief that thus the Union might have been saved, and the rights of the South secured.

Of Mr. Wise's military career, as brigadier-general, in West Virginia, on Roanoke Island (where his gifted son, O. Jennings Wise, was killed), at Charleston, on James River, and at Appomattox, it is needless to speak. Sufficient to say that the same power he had always shown to attract love and loyalty was manifested in the devotion of his officers and soldiers; that he met every fortune, of defeat or of success, with lofty mind; and that he surrendered with Lee at Appomattox, after receiving the highest encomiums from his commanding general, and from General Lee himself, for conspicuous gallantry and "unconquerable spirit," during this "most trying retreat."

The war left General Wise's home in alien hands. He repaired to Richmond, where he began again the practice of law. He refused to apply for pardon or to take the oath of amnesty; yet, strange to say, he was trusted and often consulted by the military commanders. For several years Mr. Wise enjoyed a lucrative practice in Richmond, yet not without severe struggle. His heart was wrung by the condition of his people; yet he clearly foresaw the dawn of a brighter day, and in this hope he was cheerful to the end. He died September 12, 1876, in the confidence of a perfect Christian faith. His death called forth the tenderest expressions of respect and love from the Bar, from the City, and from the entire State.

So much of brief biography seemed to be due to a man so distinguished and influential as was Mr. Wise. But when we come to estimate his position in Southern literature, a difficult question arises: What is literature, and what constitutes literary distinction?

Mr. Wise was well equipped both by nature and by education for literary expression; he was a wide reader and a practiced writer; yet he never acquired a distinct style. His expression, guided by temperament rather than by intellect, varied with his moods, and his moods were oceanic alike in power and variableness. During the period of his political prominence (say from 1840 to 1860) his letters, covering almost every pending subject, were often masterpieces of political exposition; yet only a few of them have been preserved. After the war he wrote his 'Seven Decades of the Union.' This book, which, the writer says, "is not altogether a biography and not at all a history"—and which he described as "a task of tears dashed with some sacred joy"—presents delightful glimpses of Mr. Wise's varied style and of his attractive personality. It is full of vivid and charming descriptions of persons, of places, and of events. Yet this book, delightful and valuable as it is, would hardly alone entitle Mr. Wise to a place in the record of Southern literature. Whence, then, is his claim?

Mr. Wise was, supremely and gloriously, an orator. Is spoken eloquence literature? Measured by its duration it certainly is not; for no printed page, even if the words are recorded, can give any conception of the entrancing power of spoken eloquence at the moment of utterance. Yet, if measured by power and effect, surely oratory is literature, and, in its highest forms, belongs to the highest literature; for no mode of human expression is so potent. Perhaps it is part of the law of compensation that that which is so immediately potential, like the mighty flash of the lightning, should be transitory—it would be too dangerous a power if permanent.

No possible description can convey to the reader any just conception of the power of Mr. Wise's oratory. For this power he was supremely gifted: with a tall, slender, sinewy person; a head of classic beauty; a countenance strong, mobile, luminous; an eye that flashed with fire or melted with tenderness; a large and powerful mouth—a form and face, in a word, most unusual and impressive—and a voice whose power of depth or tenderness, of sweetness or terror, no words can describe, Mr. Wise was a past-master of every art of the orator. His mimicry was perfect; his denunciation was terrible; his power to command every emotion was unrivaled. The simplest words, often as they fell from his lips, had a strange, magical power. The writer has heard many great speakers, on great occasions, but he never has heard anyone who equaled Henry A. Wise. And—as is always the case—it was "the man behind the word" that gave to the word its most potent energy. It was the earnestness, the passion, of the speaker, and the sympathetic faith of the audience in the man, that made his speech so irresistible. Such a power is a potent, a perilous gift. No man ever used it more nobly, or for nobler uses than did Henry A. Wise.

Of this wonderful power of Mr. Wise's eloquence, many testimonies exist, but unfortunately only few records; indeed, no adequate record would be possible. Such impressions may be remembered—they cannot be reproduced. Notable descriptions by Governor Cameron of Virginia, and by the poet, James Barron Hope, are quoted in the 'Life of Governor Wise,' by his grandson, Barton Wise, and a few quotations are added in the following pages. But no quotation or description can give any idea of Mr. Wise's power as a speaker. It is a remarkable fact, too, that the same extraordinary charm showed itself in Mr. Wise's familiar talk. He never was more charming than in his own home, or in the familiar circle of friends. He did not, as is so often the case, grow smaller by proximity, and it can be truly said that those who knew him best most admired and loved him. My own remembrance of him is among my most precious possessions.

FORMATION AND ADMISSION OF NEW STATES

From an Address on "Territorial Government and the Admission of New States," delivered in 1859.

. . . AND here we approach the steps of the heights of sovereignty in the people. Thus far they are, and have been considered, in the territorial state, and now they are to make a sovereign state of a territory. They have been in provincial pupillage, under the protecting power and patronage of the congress, as trustee and agent of the whole United States. . . . In a word, a munificent and beneficent free federal government has led them by the hand, during their infant weakness and poverty, in the wilderness, until they have grown strong and able to stand and walk and run, with vigorous strides, alone. And now, they are to put on the attributes of sovereignty; the potentiality and puissance of self-government. They are to put away childish things, and become more than men—an American, self-governed, sovereign people. Ah, what beauty and beneficence and power there have been in the operation of our Constitution, and land laws and ordinances, when allowed to operate in the full virtue and wisdom of their grand original conception. There was no precedent for them in human history. They are original. The feudal system, the system of the common and civil laws, were nothing like them, and nothing to compare with them. Next to the wisdom of the Constitution itself, is the wisdom of the land system of the United States. . . . It opened the western forests, and forded the western mighty rivers, and bridged streams, and made wagon roads over mountains, and built the millions of happy homes which now shelter the valleys and plains of our vast western world. Never before has any land system worked such wonders of settlement and civilization, and physical and moral subjugation for man's development. Never before has migration been poured from overflowing fountains of population into a wild, wide world, waiting for man, his axe, his hoe and his plough, and his school-house, and his court-house, and his state-house! And now that the territory is ready for it, and as soon as it is ready for it, it shall have its state-house; its own constitution, its own laws, its own legislature and executive and judiciary. When ready, it shall ascend to the high priesthood of political rights, and it shall minister at the altar of civil and religious liberty, with sovereign power.

No people should assume that holy office without their proper probation and preparation. To create a new state is the highest attribute of man. It comes next to the attribute of Deity, to create a sentient, responsible being, clothed with the fearful powers of good and evil over thousands and millions, for generations and ages. . . .

This is not a contest to be decided by the laws of man, but by the laws of nature, and by the providence of God; not by that "higher law" of high-handed aggression and arrogant dominancy which sets at naught constitutions and statutes of human government, but by reverence for laws, human and divine, and by enlightened reason and conscience, which teach us to follow nature and to pursue the path of experience and profit which she points out. The "fool in his heart who says there is no God," sees the frost king shooting his borealis lights from the north pole, and he then looks to the sun of the summer solstice which never crosses Cancer's line north, and he says there is a war in the elements of nature, and nature herself, he thinks, sets them contending—frost with sun, cold with heat, north with south, and south with north. But how differently does nature's music of the spheres answer back in all ultimate harmony and peace! The law of frost and the law of the sun are reconciled and kiss each other in the blending of lights and temperature, in the equipoise of expansion and contraction, in the variety of climate and of production, in the supply and sustentation of animal and vegetable life and health in every form of its existence. Nature makes no wars, but arrays and mingles elements, and subdues the one by the other only when her course is opposed or obstructed. Her hyperborean cold piles up icebergs, and these again her heat melts apart and sets them floating towards an equator to refrigerate the seas of the south, to make invigorating winds and airs and fructifying dews and rains. This is all as harmonious as heat and cold, if God alone be acknowledged the supreme providence, and if his work and law be not obstructed and opposed by the folly of man. The heat and the cold, the frost and the sun seem to contend, but it is only at last to make harmony and variety, and a perfect balance by counter-influence and exchange of forces. And so this seeming war of north and south would be ultimately happy and harmonious, but for the ignorance and narrowness and short-sightedness of human vision.

TRIBUTE TO WASHINGTON

Address delivered at the Unveiling of the Washington Monument, at Richmond, 1858.

COUNTRYMEN AND FELLOW-CITIZENS!

Virginia has called the Nation, its Elders and Councilors; her sister States, their Governors, Lawgivers and Judges; her own People and all the children of this Confederate Family of Freedom, to assemble this anniversary birthday around the Monument she has raised to the memory of that son whose wisdom, valor and virtue won the grandest, proudest, purest of all earthly titles, "Father of his Country!" In her name, I bid you all—all! welcome to the gathering around VIRGINIA'S MONUMENT TO WASHINGTON.

Magic name! If none other under Heaven can draw us to each other, that talisman can touch the chords of unison, and clasp us hand to hand, and bind us heart to heart, in the kindred heirship of one Patriot Father!—Before that august name Feud and Faction stand abashed:—Civil Discord hushes into awed silence:—schisms and sections are subdued and vanish:—for, in the very naming of that name, there is the sweet concord of Love, Veneration, Gratitude, Duty, Patriotism and Self-Devotion:—In it there is the harmony of peace and the power only of victorious war, and the spell of Order, and Liberty and Law, and the strength and beauty of National Union. It typifies all that there is and ought to be of goodness, greatness and majesty in that country we call "Our Country!"—the United States of America. And that country is the best type of its father.

We will, then, this day gather together the National Affections and bind them as American fasces around this Statue erected by the Mother State to the Father Son.

Virginia:

Parent of valor, cast away thy fear!

Mother of men, be proud without a tear!

What a theme! What a scene for men and angels! May our God, in whose bosom he rests, who guarded him in our country's battles, and who guided him in our country's councils, vouchsafe that his spirit may continue to hover over the land he saved, and perpetuate it peaceful, powerful, plentiful, and free, through all vicissitudes of storm and sunshine, until earthly monuments shall moulder into dust, and humanity shall triumph over the probation of Time, or Time itself shall be no more.

SPEECH AT THE FREE SCHOOL CELEBRATION

Delivered in Northampton County, 1850.

. . . FATHERS! farmers! I pray you to watch and work for your children, only as you watch and work for the grass of the field. For your corn-plants you, in season, prepare the soil by patient ploughing: at much cost of labor and money you fertilize the earth: early you put in the seed: that seed you guard by every device against every devouring or destroying enemy: the moment the tender shoot springs forth you apply the ploughshare, and give air to the plants, and this you do both ways: you watch the growth with the eye of experience and at the proper time, after breaking every clod, when the plant has strength and blade to bear it, you give it earth for its roots, and this is done both ways: and you pluck out grass and every noxious weed: and you look to the sun and the cloud and to Heaven's rain and dew with hope and prayer. And by and by the stock shoots forth an ear, and then comes the beautiful silk and fructifying tassels, and at last, the "sere and yellow leaf" of autumn bears witness to you of the reward of all your toil in an abundant harvest. Your winter stores are laid by, Providence is bountiful, and your barns groan under the weight of the golden grain! What would your fields have yielded but for labor, but for expense and perseverance in toil? Naught but noxious weeds. The minds of your children are more precious plants than are those of the corn! If ye so work and so watch for these, what ought ye not to do for that plant which is not grass of the fields, which is not food for beasts, which is not to bear fruit of earth—that plant which is a moral, sentient being, the emanation of the Divine breath, that plant of reason and conscience, and passions and affections, which is immortal! . . .

Children of the Free Schools!—Oh! that my lips were touched by the live coals from off the altar, I would inspire you with the eager love and aspiration for Knowledge and Virtue!—Could you but be made to know your destiny and its temporal and eternal wants, no power of state or parent or prince could withhold you from the fountains of both. Could you but drink deep and drink early of the Pierian spring, the sons should at once be wiser than their fathers and the daughters be mightier than their mothers. Ye should be armed with a wand of potent magic more wondrous to yourselves than the fables of the Arabian nights. Ye should brighten all earth with gladness and glory around you! The sun should glow more glorious and the stars shine more dazzling bright, and earth should spread a greener carpet of herbage, and houses should be palaces, and thickets groves of ambrosial shade, the fountains should be fresher, the sea sublimer! And ye should have power and place, and your pride should be exalted, and ye should have gold and all it gilds. Your ambition should be filled to perfect bliss of enjoyment; ye should have posterity happier than yourselves and gilded monuments and a history of renown among nations throughout all time! To open to this scene and state of enchantment the whole secret lies in searching for and finding the Diamond key of Knowledge and Virtue!

LATENT WEALTH OF VIRGINIA

From a Speech delivered at Alexandria, Virginia, 1855.

. . . VIRGINIA has every element of commerce, of agriculture, of mining and of manufacturing. On Chesapeake Bay, from the mouth of the Rappahannock to the capes of the Chesapeake, you have roadsteads and harbors sufficient to float the navies of the world. From the river of Swans, on whose margin we are, down to the line of North Carolina, you have the Potomac, the Rappahannock, the Penankatank, from Mobjack Bay to James River and the Elizabeth River—all meeting in the most beautiful sheets of water of all the seas of the earth. You have the bowels of your Western mountains rich in iron, in copper, in coal, in salt, in gypsum, and the very earth is rich in oil which makes the very rivers inflame. You have the line of the Alleghany, that beautiful blue ridge which stands placed there by the Almighty, not to obstruct the way of the people to market, but placed there in the very bounty of Providence to milk the clouds, to make the sweet springs which are the sources of your rivers. And at the head of every stream is the waterfall murmuring the very music of your power. And yet commerce has long ago spread her sails and sailed away from you; you have not, as yet, dug more than coal enough to warm yourselves at your own hearths; you have set no tilt-hammer of Vulcan to strike blows worthy of gods in iron foundries. You have not yet spun more than coarse cotton enough to clothe your own slaves. You have had no commerce, no mining, no manufacturing. You have relied alone on the single power of agriculture—and such agriculture! Your sedge patches outshine the sun. Your inattention to your only source of wealth has scarred the very bosom of Mother Earth. Instead of having cattle to feed on a thousand hills, you have to chase the stump-tailed steer through the sedge patches to get a tough beefsteak for your breakfast. And yet old Virginia has still a million and a half of population—she has still her harbors and rivers and her water power, and every source of wealth which thinking men, active men, enterprising men, need apply to. . . .

PRESIDENT JACKSON RECEIVES THE FRENCH AMBASSADOR

From 'Seven Decades of the Union.'

. . . BUT, on another occasion, his ignorance of language did entangle him in a ridiculous mistake, and almost in a scrape. During his administration, whilst Mr. Louis McLane of Delaware, was Secretary of State, France sent a certain dashing Minister to Washington, a young man just elevated above the grade of chargé, whose passion was display. His outfit of equipage, grooms, postilions, and gold lace was magnificent. He called on the Secretary of State to appoint an audience with the President; and Mr. McLane, an accomplished, easy gentleman, begged him to call the next morning at ten o'clock at the State office, and he would accompany and present him to the President.

Monsieur le Ministre mistook as to the place of calling. He thought he was to call at the President's mansion at ten o'clock A.M. Accordingly, in full panoply of costume, in coach-and-four, with attendants, grooms, postilions, outriders, and footmen, at the hour appointed he drove up to the front door of the White House, instead of the State Department, where Mr. McLane was awaiting his arrival.

At that time the President was served by a French cook, and the celebrated Irishman, Jemmy O'Neal, was General Jackson's petted major-domo. The hour was about the time of General Jackson's finishing puff of the pipe after breakfast, and he smoked, as he did everything else, with all his might! His mode was no Latakia curl, no dreamy, thready line, from barely-opened lips; but a full drawing and expanding volume of white cloud, rising up whiff after whiff, puff after puff, and bowl and stem and pipe all smoked as hard and fast as they could, and the fire was red and the ashes hot, and the whole room was so obfuscated that one could hardly breathe its atmosphere or see. His usual mode of sitting while smoking was with his left leg thrown across the right, and the left toe brought behind the right tendon-Achilles, and the long pipe-stem resting in the fork or crotch of the two knees, and reaching nearly to the floor. He smoked the old Powhatan bowl, with reed stem very long. In this attitude he was sitting and smoking, whilst Mr. McLane was waiting at the State office for Mr. Minister, and whilst Mr. Minister was riding up to the presidential mansion. He arrived—the French cook in the kitchen, Jemmy O'Neal about his business, and General Jackson alone in his office. A bustle was made, bells began to ring. Jemmy was summoned to the door, and there presented itself all this parade. The devil a word could Jemmy understand, and the best he could do was to run up-stairs to the General and announce somebody very grand; but Jemmy winked that all didn't seem right, as there seemed too much fuss for that soon in the morning, and it might be, after all, an imposition:—"Och, there was no telling about the thing, it was so unusual!" It might turn out what afterwards occurred—a Lawrence affair! The general quietly replied, "Oh, Jemmy, show the stranger up—we will see who it is." Jemmy ran, and Jackson sat smoking, when presently the room-door was thrown wide open, and a manikin of gold-lace entered, cocked hat, with bullion and white feather, flourished in hand, making a salaam to the right and a salaam to the left with tremendous sweeps, whizzing and whirring French with vehement gesture, and approaching nearer and nearer; it seemed threatening in the extreme!

The President quit smoking, beat the bowl of his pipe in his hand, rose quickly, took hold of the back of his chair, and exclaimed with strong voice, "By the eternal gods, Jemmy O'Neal, who is this?"

Jemmy, with eyes and ears open, and hands ready, was amazedly looking on, when, fortunately, he bethought him of the French cook, and ran for him. There was no time to be lost: so the French cook, with his shirt-sleeves rolled up to his shoulders, and just as he was, besprinkled white with flour, ran up with Jemmy, arriving just in time to save Mr. Minister's pate from being smashed by the chair in General Jackson's hands.

"Mon Dieu!" exclaimed the cook: "it is the grand minister of Louis Philippe!"

"Oh!" said the general: "walk in, sir; there is no ceremony here!" and he was about taking the minister by both hands just as Mr. McLane entered to see the mistake, to witness the prevention of the catastrophe, and to enjoy the joke, which made him a thousand times afterwards "shake" with jollity "like a bowlful of jelly."

A NEW ERA

From a Speech delivered at Winchester, Virginia, 1867.

. . . THE plantation interest is gone, and farming, embracing every variety of products instead of a few large staples—arboriculture, horticulture, and stock-feeding and grazing, and cultivating on a small scale none but the most improved lands, and these tilled to the square inch by the most able, intelligent, and skilful laborers, hired at a rate which close farming only can afford—must be substituted, and will change and immensely enrich the whole system of our agriculture. This is not a matter of theory, but it is a stubborn fact, a stern necessity which we must look steadily in the face, with the resolution, industry, and perseverance to conform to the change. It is repulsive to our habits, awkward and burdensome at first, and we were wholly unprepared for it. But we have no alternative and must abide the result. How abide it? Fold our arms and cry out, "What can we do?" "We have no capital." No; there is a blessing beyond measure in this change. Nothing but fire and blood could have driven us to it, and it has shown what a weakness to our people African slavery was. Its weakness was so great that itself amounted to wickedness. Nothing but negrodom ever could have conquered such a people as were the masters of Virginia slaves! The faith of Jackson foresaw this: the war was inevitable, it was providential. Nothing but war could have shocked us out of this weakness into a new strength and vigor. We had to fight, and had to surrender, too; but it was in the end to be a noble, a great and incalculable victory. It was to build anew thousands of cottages, hamlets, and towns and cities where heretofore stood lone mansions of masters whose broad-spread acres were scourged by slaves. It was to improve labor by a price laid upon it; it was to bring an eye over every inch of soil and to fructify it by the watchful interest and active attention of its own proprietor; and it was to increase a white population that would be numerous and strong and give the land its greatest pride, a solid Caucasian yeomanry, instead of being filled by ignorant, lazy slaves of a degraded race! Do you say that this will overdo farming? I reply that farming, the production of bread-stuffs, fruits, and grapes, can't be overdone. The more farming, less will labor and living cost, and a people can't be but strong that can and will produce its own bread and meat and clothing cheap, and the more plentiful the cheaper. The lands will pay all the laborers worthy of their hire that you can put upon them, and the old problem: "How little labor for how much land?" will be more than solved by its opposing problem: "How much labor on how little land?" Like Agricola at Rome, on one-tenth, after division to nine sons, you shall realize more than was made before on the whole. Don't call out for Hercules, don't cry to the North nor to the money-changers for capital—a curse of the times that sells conscience and soils honor, and betrays comrades and country—but put your own shoulders to the wheel! Oh! young men who have fathers with naught now left but negro-scourged tobacco and wheat fields, burthened with old debts enough to break the hearts of honest men and make them bow in want with sorrow to the grave—pull off your broadcloths—bare your arms—blister your hands until blisters become callous, to plough and reap the plenty which earnest labor will surely bring home to pay debts and provide comfort and maintain manly independence! You have no longer the host of slavery's drones to feed and clothe; your expenses now are comparatively small. Only be self-denying, determined, and work! You need not fear that there will be too many of you in the field. But if there are, those not wanting and not willing there can find occupations now multiplied and varied beyond what plantations afforded, to try their fortunes on. Mining, manufacturing, commerce, mechanic arts, will now open avenues for skill and enterprise; and improvements in all these will soon pay professional avocations higher fees and wages than ever compensated them before.

Have your fathers thousands of acres of land which now yield no income and cannot afford to pay labor for their cultivation? Lay off the garden spots, scrape the mounds of humus all around every curtilage, compost your wasted manures for the little space you can till, and sell or rent out or let lie out every impoverished acre. Aye, do better—advertise to select emigrants that you will gladly give to them one-half your superfluous lands and help them build and fence them, if they will come and settle the other half. Their settlement will make the other half far more valuable than was or is the whole. They will give you neighborhood and life, and bring to you new lights, and be your source of most efficient labor and of richest terms. Abandon "one ideas"; here it is wheat, there it is tobacco, yonder corn and potatoes, and somewhere else it is brandy and goober-peas. Go to the fields and be taught by your own experience; learn of other crops and prepare your own fertilizers from the forest leaves and pine tags and straw and from well-fed cattle and pig pens. Don't stand on the river bank like the fool of Horace and wait for the waters to pass by before you cross this Rubicon. Don't wait to manure until you can get capital to buy guano. Borrow not at all, but work, and you will have wherewith to lend. The faith of Jackson saw this, that the war would put our young men to work. No more fair hands! No more lazy morning hours! No more cigars and juleps! No more card-parties and club-idleness! No more siren retreats in summer, and city hells in winter!

The hard necessity which presses down upon our people may change the Virginia character in some lamentable respects, but it will also happily strengthen it in other important traits. It will dispel some weaknesses which, though grand and noble, impeded the power and progress of the State. Of the true old Virginian it may well be said:

High-minded he was ever, and improvident,
But pitiful and generous to a fault;
Pleasures he loved, but honor was his idol.

To young Virginians I would say: High-minded, pitiful, and generous be as were your fathers; honor must ever be your idol; but be just before you are generous; and let a life of mere pleasure and all improvidence now cease.

JOHN SERGEANT WISE

[1846—]

J. H. LINDSAY

JOHN SERGEANT WISE, son of Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, and Sarah, daughter of the Honorable John Sergeant, of Philadelphia, was born at Rio de Janeiro, December 26, 1846, when his father was United States Minister to Brazil. After 1847 he lived at the paternal residence in the County of Accomac, Virginia, and in Richmond, when his father was Governor, from 1856 to 1860. He attended several preparatory schools, and the Virginia Military Institute at Lexington. He remained at the Institute until May, 1864, when the cadet corps joined General Breckenridge in the Shenandoah Valley to repel General Siegel. He was wounded in the battle of Newmarket, May 15, 1864. In the summer of that year he was at Petersburg with his father, and in October was commissioned drill-master with the rank and pay of a lieutenant in the provisional army of the Confederacy, and was in the battle of Saltville. The next winter he was adjutant to a reserve battalion of artillery, and when Richmond was evacuated he was the last despatch-bearer from Jefferson Davis to General Lee, and bore General Lee's last despatch to Mr. Davis at Danville. While bearing return despatches, he learned of the surrender of Lee's army, and, turning southward, made his way to the army of General Johnston, with which he served until its surrender.

After the war Mr. Wise returned to his studies. At the University of Virginia he gained the debaters' medal of the Washington Literary Society, and was graduated in law, moral philosophy, and political economy in 1867, and was a student under those famous teachers, John B. Minor and William H. McGuffey. He began the practice of his profession in Richmond before he was twenty-one, and two years later married Miss Eva Douglas, of Nashville, Tennessee. He was a partner of his father until the death of Governor Wise in 1876.

About 1875 he became interested in a controversy for a Virginia senatorship between Colonel Knight and General Bradley T. Johnson, and published a series of newspaper letters arraigning the party managers for their corrupt methods. The prominence thus gained brought him to the front in the so-called reform element in Richmond politics. He supported the movement which resulted in the nomination for Governor of Colonel Frederick W. M. Holliday in 1877. A year later he declined a nomination for Congress in favor of General Joseph E. Johnston. Mr. Wise's course carried him beyond the limits of the Democratic party and invited and received the condemnation of a large number of Virginians of the class to which his family belonged.

Whether Mr. Wise was right or wrong, he was regarded as too advanced politically, and shared the fate of the pioneer. At times public feeling against him in Virginia has been strong and even bitter. He has made no effort to placate it, and his utterances have at all times been bold, exceedingly keen, and sometimes bitter; but the most violent of his opponents have always admitted his abilities, and his integrity never has been impugned. And men forget their objections to his political views when they recall his career as a boy soldier, a strong, successful lawyer, a man devoted to his friends, a sportsman, a wit, and a host.

In 1880 he was independent candidate for Congress against his cousin, George D. Wise, Democrat, and was defeated, but was compensated (in 1881) with an appointment as United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia.

In 1882 he was elected Congressman-at-large from Virginia. In Congress he voted with the Republican party, and in May, 1885, he was the Republican candidate for Governor of Virginia, but was defeated by General Fitzhugh Lee, a result never accepted by Mr. Wise or his supporters, as justified by the true returns.

In 1887 he became counsel for an electric company constructing in Richmond the first electric railway in the United States. In consequence of this employment he removed to New York in 1888, where in turn he was general counsel for the Sprague Electric Company and attorney for the Railroad Department of the Edison Electric Company and of the General Electric Company, as they were successively formed, an employment which demanded his attention in twenty-seven States of the Union and in England. Since 1888 he has lived in New York, where he has practiced his profession. Mr. Wise, however, never has entirely separated himself from Virginia, for he has owned for the last fourteen years a farm on the Point of Cape Charles, Virginia, where he and his family spend several months each year.

A great national controversy arose between electric railways and the telephone companies. Mr. Wise had charge of this, and for several years was engaged in it almost exclusively upon first coming to New York, and became a leading legal authority upon subjects pertaining to that controversy. His arguments were translated into German and used in the debates in the German Reichstag.

Recently he has turned his attention to general practice, particularly to railroad reorganizations and corporations. He has also been prominent in politics as a Republican, and in society; is a member of several leading clubs, and has a national reputation as a campaign orator.

Of late Mr. Wise has devoted his leisure time to literary pursuits and has produced a number of books. He is especially happy as a writer of short articles upon a great variety of subjects, has been known for many years as an authority upon field sports, and has written fluently over the pen name of "Plover" in many sporting journals of America. Among his historical sketches are those of General Lee, Stonewall Jackson, General Longstreet, General Johnston, John B. Gordon, Henry Irving, and Joseph Jefferson. He has contributed valuable articles upon the practice of dueling. Such a sketch, coming from the hand of Mr. Wise, is especially interesting and is entitled to great weight, for, having himself recognized the code on more than one occasion, he was, perhaps, the first prominent Virginian to seek to give a death-blow to the practice.

Mr. Wise, in an address to the cadet corps, gave the first description of the battle of New Market, in which the corps of cadets of the Virginia Military Institute distinguished itself. All subsequent attempts to portray the spirit of this band of boys, their gallantry and the events of the conflict, sink into insignificance compared with this romantic description from Mr. Wise's pen.

Like most authors, Mr. Wise has the highest regard for that one of his books which is not the popular favorite. He says his head may have been best in 'The End of an Era,' but his heart was in 'Doomed' and his soul in 'The Lion's Skin,' which has been least noticed.

A list of his books includes: 'Doomed' (1898); 'The End of an Era' (1899); 'The Lion's Skin' (1905); 'Recollections of Thirteen Presidents' (1906); 'Citizenship' (1906), and 'The American Pedigreed Pointer.'

The volume 'Citizenship,' while a work on legal topics, is a popular treatment of the subject designed for educated citizens and intelligible to them, not only lawyers but laymen. In this work not only the law upon the subject, but decisions of the courts on all its phases, and citations of every case ever decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, involving any question of citizenship, are set forth.

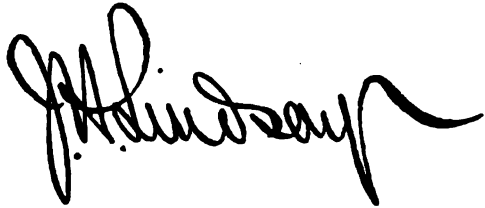

'Diomed' is the "Black Beauty" of dog fiction. Mr. Wise makes a noble setter dog which he owned and loved tell the story of his hunting days. This book has been read by thousands of sportsmen and their children, who have laughed at its humor and who have been brought to tears by its pathos.

'The Lion's Skin' is a story of reconstruction days in Virginia, based upon fact. The events described are those in which the author was a leading figure. It is a confession of the author's soul, and a book which shows how he has been ruled by his convictions. What is probably most valuable, historically speaking, in 'The Lion's Skin' is Mr. Wise's description of the University of Virginia, its customs and the life of its students during the days following the Civil War.

'The Recollections of Thirteen Presidents' is remarkable for its personal, intimate story of the author's acquaintance with thirteen Presidents of the United States. It throws much light on the customs of the times and on the personal character and peculiarities of these great men, and from its pages we learn much for which we would search more formal records in vain.

Mr. Wise's latest work is 'The American Pedigreed Pointer,' which appeared serially in The American Field. This is one of the most complete and remarkable books of its kind ever written, for it contains a record and history of the breeding of every pointer dog of any prominence that ever ran in the United States.

THE MISTRESS OF ONLY

From 'The End of an Era.' Copyright, Houghton, Mifflin and Company, and used here by permission of the publishers.

BUT it was not so with the mistress of Only. She had too much of the old Puritan blood in her to ignore the word "duty." She adored her husband, and was as ambitious as himself, which is saying a great deal. She knew that if he was to maintain his professional and political prominence, she must assume her share of the duties of their domestic life; and when she fully realized what that meant for her, she doubted her ability to bear the burden it imposed; but, asking God to sustain her, resolved to try.

With the abundance of servants at her command, the care of her children was a task comparatively easy. But it was these very servants who were the chief cause of her anxieties. They were slaves. When she had consented to marry her husband, she had not fully considered, perhaps, the difference between conducting a Philadelphia household and being mistress of a Virginia plantation. At the former place, an impudent or sick or worthless servant might be discharged or sent to the hospital, and the place supplied by another. Here, a discharge was impossible. Beside the necessity for discipline, every requirement, whether of food or clothing, or care in sickness, had to be supplied to these forty servants, who were as dependent as so many babies. In those days, slavery was not looked upon, even in Quaker Philadelphia, with the shudder and abhorrence one feels towards it now. It had not been a great while since it existed in Pennsylvania. A few slaves were still owned in Delaware, and Maryland and Virginia were slave States. The time had come, it is true, when it was abolished in Pennsylvania; but its existence was a fact so familiar that it produced no particular protest or expression of abhorrence, and, by all save a small coterie of abolitionists, was regarded as probably permanent. Slave-owners mingled with non-slave-owners upon terms of mutual regard and respect, unaffected, apparently at least, by any consideration of the subject of slavery.

Even if my mother had no qualms of conscience concerning ownership of negroes, her sense of duty carried her far beyond the mere supplying of their physical needs, or requiring that they render faithful service. Forty immortal souls, as she viewed it, had been committed to her guidance. Every time one of these gentle and affectionate creatures called her "mistress," the sense of obligation resting upon her, to keep their souls as well as their bodies fit for God, echoed back to her tender heart with alarming distinctness. And in time, sweetly and humbly as she performed her task, it became very irksome. She sleeps to-day in Laurel Hill, on the banks of the Schuylkill, having died at the early age of thirty-three, and no one knows how much that sense of duty contributed to her death.

Ah, you who blame the slaveholder of the olden day, how little you know whereof you speak, or how he or she became such; how little allowance you make for surrounding circumstances; how little you reckon, in your general anathemas against the slave-owner, of the true and beautiful and good lives that sacrificed themselves, toiling to do their duty to the slaves in that state of life to which it pleased God to call them! There is not a graveyard in Old Virginia but has some tombstone marking the resting-place of somebody who accepted slavery as he or she found it, who bore it as a duty and a burden, and who wore himself or herself out in the conscientious effort to perform that duty well. Mark you, I am not bemoaning the abolition of slavery. It was a curse, and nobody knows better than I the terrible abuses which were possible and actual under the system. Thank God, it is gone.

All that I am saying to you now is, you who fought slavery, as well as you who have heard it described in the passionate denunciations following its death, realize that the name of slave-owner did not always, or even in the majority of cases, imply that the slave-owner was one whit less conscientious, or one whit less entitled to man's respect or God's love, than you, who, because, perhaps, you were never slave-owners, delight to picture them as something inferior to your precious selves. After all, it was not you, but God, that abolished slavery. You were His mere instruments to do His work.

In the case of my mother, her task was somewhat lightened by the character of her possessions, for the slaves were of more than usual intelligence, and were, for the most part, family inheritances.

This was no abode of hardship and stony hearts. No slaves were sold from that plantation. The young ones might have eaten their master's head off before he would have taken money for their fathers' and their mothers' children. No overseer brandished the whip that is so prominent a feature upon the stage, or in the abolition books of fiction.

Back to me, through the mists of nearly half a century, comes once more the vision of the young Puritan mother, who followed the man she loved into this exile from every association of her youth, and yet was happy in that love because she worshipped him next to her God.

Now I see her upon a Sabbath afternoon, with all her slaves assembled in the hallways, dressed in their Sunday clothes. Young and old, her own children and her servants, are gathered about her to listen to the word of God.

I have heard many great orators and preachers in my day, but never a voice like that of my mother, as she read and expounded the Holy Word to her children and to her slaves.

In later years, I have heard great voices and great melodies, but never sweeter sounds to mortal ear than those of my mother and her children and her slaves, singing the simple hymns she read out to them on those Sabbath afternoons at Only, in the days of slavery.

Then came the lessons in the catechism taught to children and slaves in the same class, where, before God, the two stood upon equal terms, the blacks sometimes proving themselves to be the quicker scholars of the two.

Such was my childhood's home; and such was many another home in that land which, year by year, is being more and more depicted by ignorance and prejudice as the abode of only the brutal slave-driver and his victim.

The beautiful month of October, 1850, with its wealth of color and its exquisite skies, rolled round. All seemed well at home. My father, once more immersed in political life, was absent in Richmond, a delegate to a great constitutional convention, where all his energies were directed towards adjusting the true basis of representation in the legislature between the sections of Virginia where slavery existed and those where no slaves were owned. It was a difficult question, on which he had taken ground in favor of a manhood suffrage as opposed to suffrage based upon representation of the property owners. Nearly every mail brought letters to mother announcing the progress of the fight, in which she seemed deeply absorbed. The reputation which her husband was making resulted five years later in his election as governor, and she clearly foresaw the result. This prospect reconciled her to the separation, and made her look bravely forward to an expected event.

One day I missed my mother, and was told that she was ill. Servants were hurrying back and forth, and soon the doctor arrived. Bedtime came, and Eliza, the white nurse, took me away from the nursery adjoining my mother's chamber, and put me to bed in a strange room. There after undressing me, she made me kneel, and, in saying my prayers, ask God to bless mamma. When I was tucked away in bed, she sat beside me, and stroked my long tresses, and sighed. It was all very strange. "Mammy Liza, is mamma very sick?" I asked. "No, my child, I hope not," said she, and then bade me go to sleep, and soon I closed my eyes.

It was not for long, for in an hour or two I heard voices in the hall, and hurrying footsteps, and, awakening and sitting bolt upright in bed awhile, I finally slipped down to the floor, and made my way, in my thin night clothes, into the hall, where I found the servants assembled, and weeping as if their hearts would break, uttering loud lamentations. "What is it, Aunt Mary Anne?" said I, cold and shivering with fright. "Oh, my poor baby, yo' mamma is dead—yo' mamma is dead! Oh, my po', po' mistis is dead—yo' mamma is dead!" she screamed, at the same time seizing me, and wrapping me in her shawl, and bearing me back to the warmth.

Night wore away mournfully enough, until at last, with a faithful slave beside me, I sobbed myself asleep, crying more because others about me wept, than because I knew the real cause of my grief. Morning came, and when I awoke, I could not yet fully understand the solemn silence of all about me, or the meaning of the strange black things I saw. Breakfast over, the old nurse came to me to go with her to see mamma. In silence, and amid the sobs of every servant on the place, I and my little brother and sister were led into a darkened room. There, on the bamboo bedstead which she had brought as her favorite from Rio, lay mamma, apparently asleep, a tiny baby resting on her breast. By her side, his head buried in the pillow, and sobbing as if his heart would break, was my oldest brother—not her own child, but one who had loved her as his own mother, and who now mourned a second mother dead. Gazing out of the half-opened window, dressed in solemn black, stood the physician who had sought in vain to save her. I was frightened and awed beyond utterance.

The next day the Fashion, Captain Hopkin's best vessel, lay at the Only landing. A fearful-looking black box covered with velvet was borne aboard the Planter with solemn steps. Her sails were hoisted. With the freshening breeze she bore away, and, as the evening sunlight made a shining pathway on Onancock Creek, the vessel pursued her course westward until she became a tiny speck and disappeared. They told me that my mother was in heaven. Since that day, whenever the route to heaven arises to my mind, I see the white sails of a vessel gliding westward in the golden pathway made upon dancing waters by the brilliant sinking sun of a clear autumn evening.

A MEMORABLE SESSION AT THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA

From 'The Lion's Skin.' Copyright, Doubleday, Page and Company, and used here by permission of the publishers.

. . . ONE result of all this was that up to the end of the war many of the old Virginia Federalists avoided the university, subordinated their State pride to their political prejudices, and sent their sons to Princeton, Yale or Harvard rather than have them associate with Jeffersonian Republicans, nullifiers, and secessionists of the Calhoun school at the university.

There, under the teachings of brilliant and accomplished men like Tucker, Bledsoe, and Holcomb, the doctrines of strict construction, State rights, and secession had been expounded, and to them had flocked the flower of Southern youth, until the whole South was permeated with the theories of Jefferson, amplified into the defiance of Calhoun, and fomented into Civil War by the eloquence and passion of men like Toombs and Rhett, Lamar, Wigfall, Yancey and John Randolph Tucker. At this great school, for great it was, whether its influence was for good or evil, the doctrine and the argument upon which the Confederate government was based had been powerfully expounded and from it more widely disseminated, than from anywhere else in the whole South, and to it still flocked the sons of those who had embraced its teachings with enthusiasm and still cherished them as gospel truths, regardless of overwhelming defeat.

But with them now came also, in larger numbers than ever before, the sons of many men who had never accepted the principles of Jefferson or Calhoun or taken their political inspirations from the teachings of this university. When political doctrines to which they had never subscribed had dominated and led to a war which they deplored, their love of their native state had overcome all else and impelled them to follow her fortunes. Having so decided, they not only enlisted in the Confederate cause, but became, in many conspicuous instances, brilliant and fearless military leaders. The common disaster in which all Confederates were now engulfed reduced consideration of past differences to a minimum, and made a school representative of the South and attended exclusively by the sons of Confederate soldiers infinitely preferable to any Northern college where Southern boys would be thrown alone among those of Northern sympathies at the time when the North was triumphant and exulting over the downfall of the South.

These considerations brought together at the University of Virginia at the session following the great Civil War the most remarkable body of students which had ever assembled within her walls. Many of them were not boys at all. On the contrary, they were mature men, some of them past thirty years of age; men who, but for the interruptions of the war, would long ago have been embarked in life's final pursuits. Many of them had been officers of high grade in the Confederate service. There were some who had ranked as high as colonels; there were adjutant-generals of divisions and brigades; there were majors who had commanded battalions of artillery and squadrons of partisan rangers; there were captains of troops and batteries and infantry; and minor officers innumerable, representing many of the best-known veteran commands in the Confederate service. Many of them were wounded; some, legless; some, armless. One thing they had in common, and that was all were poor; many of them so poor that they still wore their Confederate uniform in class. But never in all her career had the University of Virginia as earnest a body of students. The money upon which most of them had come there was the last obtainable for purposes of education. Time and teaching and opportunity then lost would have been irretrievable to them, and anxious eyes at home were watching for the diploma which was to bring back a wage-earner to the fireside.

The legal and medical lecture-rooms, the moot court, the dissecting rooms and the academic schools were crowded day after day with hundreds of earnest men drinking in every word uttered by the professors, as anxious to absorb as they were to impart knowledge. When the lectures were over, hurrying throngs hastened back to their respective rooms, not for play or idleness, but to transcribe notes, refer to authorities and secure the full benefit of all that had been taught. In the whole university there was not at that day such a thing as a private establishment among the students. Private turn-outs were unknown. Even the college dude, whose only interest is in his dress, had for the time being disappeared from college life. With the exception of a few students from Baltimore, a place which has always been noted for its correct style of dress, there were few students at the university who knew whether the garments they wore were of fashionable cut or not. There was no gymnasium, no organized athletics, and the only vent of exuberant physical strenuousness was the baseball leagues, and such games as were played between competitive nines of the same organization.

The greatest interest of the students centered primarily in their diploma, a great oration to be delivered by some invited orator at the commencement exercises, and a final ball. Next to this, in point of general interest and excitement, were the debates in the two societies called by the names of Washington and Jefferson, and their two celebrations called Intermediate and Final, with intermediate and final orator's and debater's medals. Joint debates between the societies were unknown; the selection of an intermediate or final orator or winner of the debater's medal in one of these societies was regarded as a great event, an honour almost equal to a high degree; and the zeal of friends to secure the coveted prize for the orator or debater of their choice was worthy of a much more important struggle.

In those days the Greek-letter fraternities were numerous and flourishing. Such a thing as a Chapter House was, however, unknown, and banquets, which have become features of these organizations in later days, were unheard of. A fraternity meeting would take place in the room of some member of the fraternity, and the entertainment, if there was any, consisted of the most primitive sort of food—crackers and cheese and sardines.

Students seldom met in general assembly. One or two general meetings were held upon the lawn, the speakers addressing the gathering from the steps of the rotunda.

The public hall in the rear of the rotunda, containing a very bad copy of the famous picture called "The School of Athens," was regarded as a precinct so sacred that it was seldom entered except upon commencement days.

There were large boarding-houses located upon the east and west ranges, and a number of smaller establishments outside of the university grounds furnished food for the students according to their location, and thither they were compelled to tramp back and forth in all sorts of weather, in some cases a distance of more than a quarter of a mile.

There was no such thing as compulsory chapel. On Sundays and on Wednesday evenings services were held in one of the lecture-rooms, which was fitted up as a chapel. Attendance upon religious exercises or even upon lectures was purely voluntary. There were churches of many denominations in the neighbouring town of Charlottesville, to which the students were free to go, or from which they might remain absent, according to their pleasure. Jefferson appears to have framed his university upon the idea that students were to be treated as men and not as boys, with liberty in all things amounting almost, if not quite, to license.

Of public entertainments there were none. One or two lectures, delivered by some distinguished orator upon subjects of current interest during the course of a session, was the limit of such performances. The single circus which exhibited in Charlottesville during Carrington's two-years' course was the occasion of more hilarity and dissipation than all the other diversions of his entire university career.

The favorite and, in fact, the only assembling place for social intercourse among the students was along the corridors of the east and west lawns and ranges, and in pleasant weather upon the lawns themselves. In the afternoons these places were the scene of informal gatherings of students for the exchange of views upon their favourite topics.

In front of the portion of the west lawn tenanted by a certain number of young Marylanders, the baseball contingent was wont to assemble and discuss its favourite sport. Another set was accustomed to meet about the quarters of a certain wounded ex-officer and law student. The conversation of that group was apt to run towards subjects much more serious than baseball. Such, for example, as the probable action of Congress on the Southern situation, or, at other times, to reminiscences of the days of Chancellorsville, Manassas and Gettysburg. Another point upon the lawn was the favourite gathering place for those interested in the debates of the literary societies and the aspirants for their honours. In quiet confab beneath the shaded arcades, groups of prospective theologians discussed religious matters or the affairs of the Young Men's Christian Association at another place, and at still another medical students met to regale themselves with those brutal pretences of inhumanity and insensibility to death and suffering in which they so delight.

These gatherings seriously detracted from the privacy of the dormitories located upon the lawns and ranges, while the "outlying provinces," as Monroe Hill, Dawson's Row and Carr's Hill were called, were free from such annoyances, and this, among other reasons, had led Carrington to select Carr's Hill for his abode.

The most popular place in the university was its excellent library, stored with a good selection of standard historic, literary, scientific and political works. There never was a time in its history when its treasures were so industriously sought by the students. The dormitory in which no books from the library were to be found was rare indeed. The students were conscientiously trying to repair their educational losses sustained by the interruption of war, and the books which each student read were true indices of his intellectual bent. One dormitory would be stacked with law books and masses of notes, where its occupant was even then preparing legal text-books which are now generally known in the profession. In another might be found volumes of theological and philosophical works to aid its occupant in preparing for the ministry. In another the works of standard poets, authors and political writers, on which to lay the basis of a career as orator or editor; and so on, throughout the whole catalogue of intellectual aspirations. Earnest searchings everywhere, in many instances destined to be rewarded with success.

THE MASTER AND MISTRESS OF PAMPATIKE

From 'Diomed, The Life, Travels, and Observations of a Dog.' Copyright, Lamson, Wolfe and Company, and used here by permission of the publishers.

THE most striking figure which greeted us was Colonel Carter. Of medium height, and rather slender build, his clear-cut military features were lit by an eye with an expression which could pass from that of the eagle to that of the gazelle, as occasion demanded. About his grizzled mustache and pointed beard played a smile of genuine welcome; and in his whole bearing was visible the quiet dignity and simplicity of a country gentleman, owning, as his father had before him, everything about him, and accustomed to command. At his side, her ample proportions surmounted by a face still beautiful as a Madonna, stood the mistress of Pampatike, with her two blooming daughters and a son. Behind these was a handsome man, the youngest son of Robert E. Lee, bearing his immortal name, and not unlike him. Besides the immediate family, a young tutor, and half a dozen schoolboys ranging from twelve to fifteen years of age, were grouped about them. "Gracious!" exclaimed Tracy, as he beheld the house and the number it was called upon to contain. "They will have no place for us. We must go back." "Never you mind," said master. "Houses and hospitality in these parts are made of india-rubber, and can stretch."

The process of introduction gone through with, and our wagons unloaded, the gentlemen were shown to their rooms, with all apprehensions quieted as to Pampatike's capacity for accommodating guests.

Colonel "Tom" Carter of Pampatike, as he is caressingly called by the thousands who know, honor, and love him, is a direct lineal descendant of John Carter of Corotoman, who came to Virginia in 1649; who was the trusted friend of Lord

Fairfax; and whose descendants are more numerous to-day in the Old Dominion than those of any other two men who ever begat or begot upon her soil. As a boy, Tom was sent to Virginia Military Institute, and took his degree there, little dreaming how soon his military knowledge would be needed. With the death of the old folks came his inheritance of Pampatike; and who so fitting to be its mistress as beautiful and beloved Sue Roy of Gloucester? It has been said of her, that she was so good and kind and true, as well as beautiful, that even her many rejected lovers bore her no grudge in their disappointment, and still remained her warm admirers. Here, at old Pampatike, this last generation of the Carters built their nest; and, amidst love and peace and plenty, had begun to rear another brood of the old stock, when war burst upon them. The Carters were Whigs to the last man of them. Responsibility for war lay not at their doors, for they were Federalists and Union men. But when it came in spite of them, they considered that their first allegiance was due to Virginia, and so believing, not a regiment of Virginia troops that marched away to her defense was without its full quota of the Carters. Why should it not be so? Were they not bone of her bone and flesh of her flesh? And besides, were they not cousins of Robert E. Lee? That was enough. "Blood is thicker than water," is the Carter rallying cry; and whoever strikes a Carter has the family to fight! So at it they went, hammer and tongs, and reluctant as they had been to begin, they continued fighting, such of them as were not killed, until their cousin Robert advised them that it was madness to prolong the struggle.

Tom went out as a captain of a battery. Wounded and promoted several times, he was colonel when the surrender at Appomattox came. His gallantry was as widely recognized as that of any officer of Lee's army.

His wife was as heroic as himself. Although she knew that Pampatike would necessarily be within the zone of military operations, she declared it to be her duty and her purpose to remain there and conduct and protect the plantation. This she did. But the task was not without its horrors and its dangers. Every soldier who put his foot upon the place, be he Union or Confederate, honored and respected Mrs. Carter.

She would not refuse food to the hungry, or succor to sick and wounded, whether they were friends or foes. But notwithstanding the deference shown to her by all, she could not fail to witness many harrowing sights. One day a party of Union scouts was attacked in her yard, and one of their number was shot dead upon the porch of Pampatike. When the combatants had withdrawn, she called her servants, ordered a grave prepared, read over the dead soldier the Episcopal burial service, and laid him in his grave. This done, the ordinary routine of the farm was resumed as if no war was in progress. Never a servant left her until the end. How could they? They depended upon her even more than she depended upon them. Another day, she heard the crash of every gun her husband's artillery fired at the battle at Bethesda Church, but a few miles from home.

She was alone in her room that day, praying for his safety.

So things went on—he in the forefront of the battle, she at her post upon the farm—for four years. Then came the end. The peerless infantry of Lee stacked arms. Tom Carter's battalion of artillery was parked; and as a friend said of him, "for the last time saluting the old flag that was bedabbled with his blood," he turned his head homeward to Pampatike, and never more aspired to be a soldier. Look at the colonel and his wife now—serene, hospitable, gentle. How hard it is to put them back into their old places in the past. It required close questioning to elicit from either of them any part of the story of their war-time troubles.

Impoverished by war, Colonel Carter again sought employment in active life; and as his duties took him away, she, wishing to keep her children about her, had engaged a tutor for her youngest boy, and taken eight or ten other boys as boarders. Eight or ten—that was all. People would have been so glad to send their sons to such a place that she could have had, if she would have taken them, a hundred boys; but she declined to increase the number.

We were lucky to find the colonel at home. Pampatike was at its best when "Colonel Tom," mounted on his blaze-faced bay filly, Langtry, was sweeping the low grounds with his eagle eye, just as he once rode around looking for positions for his guns.

Such were our host and hostess, and such the place where we were visiting. Oh! how it pained me to hear, a year or two ago, that the colonel had closed the Pampatike establishment! The girls and boys had married, all but one; and he, the youngest, was in business in a neighboring city. The colonel's duties called him to another State; and the lady of the house, after all her long years of rule at Pampatike, left alone, followed the others, and closed its doors.

Farewell, old place! Another of the few remaining lights of the olden times has gone out. May your mistress be happy wherever she goes. I know she will be beloved. But never flourished country-seat under sovereign's rule better than did Pampatike under the gentle sway of its charming mistress.

THE MEMORY OF DAVIS

From 'Recollections of Thirteen Presidents.' Copyright, Doubleday, Page and Company, and used here by permission of the publishers.

THE political leaders of the South must have been intensely inflamed and in deadly earnest against the North. I do not remember that in all the discussions I heard preceding the war I ever heard any Southern man concede to the Republican party or its leaders any broad or patriotic purpose or any conciliatory feeling towards the South. Lincoln, Seward, Chase, Wade, Greeley—in fact, all the Republican leaders—were denounced as South-haters who at heart rejoiced even at the lunatic blood-thirstiness of John Brown, and as men who would, if they dared to do so, incite and encourage servile insurrection, murder and rapine to accomplish the destruction of slavery, regardless of the terror or suffering which might be inflicted thereby upon their white brethren in the Southern States.

The Southern masses had unquestionably been wrought up to this belief when they voted in favor of their respective States seceding from the Union. So believing, they were fully justified in making the effort.

It is easy to say that the South was in the wrong, and, admitting it, it does not wipe out the fact that the Northern people themselves were far from blameless in that they countenanced and even encouraged the doing and the saying of many things in public and in private which gave color to the popular apprehensions in the South.

For this reason I have never felt called upon to defend my section for attempting to secede. The South may have been as arrogant and domineering as Northern writers represent her, but there was enough of arrogance and bad blood in the North to make Southern men desire to dissolve political partnership with her. The right to secede was always a debatable one, with the preponderance of logic favouring the abstract right, and sentiment, rhetoric, eloquence and the hope of National greatness all opposed.

It is all easy enough to see that the Nation is greater and more prosperous than either could possibly have been if two nations had been formed from it. But much of its greatness is the result of the great war, and it would not have achieved it if the war had not happened. It is easy, too, to moralise now about the way in which the conflict might have been avoided but for the ambitious designs of this man or that, or this set of men or that. Undoubtedly it might have been avoided if men had been angels. But the quarrelling over the things that led to the war had gone on so long and had been so acrimonious that a good blood-letting was the only way to put an end to it. When at last the fight did come, and the North proceeded to coerce the South, the attitude of the Northern man who sided with the South was not a whit more peculiar or unnatural than that of the Southerner who sided with the North. It required a great deal more of explanation to justify the action of such than to justify those who maintained their natural affiliations.

Unquestionably there were good men from both sections who adhered to the opposite section. But there were not many of that kind on either side. As a class those who took sides against their own section were a sorry lot, both North and South, and both sides know it, whether they confess the fact or not.

For myself I am glad I sided with the South. I do not mean to imply by this that, after all, things did not turn out for the best. But the Southern side was mine, naturally, and I would rather have been whipped fighting for and with my friends than have aided in such a bitter and blood-thirsty struggle against them. In after years I became identified with a political party which is opposed by the great mass of my old Confederate comrades. But that is quite a different matter. It is not like fighting them and shedding their blood.

It only means that concerning political policies and current events I believe that I have more common sense than they have. They do not think so now, but the time will come when they will find out that I was in the right and they were in the wrong. But quarrel as we may about the things of the present, they cannot deny my Confederate brotherhood with them, nor can they rob me, if in their warmth they would attempt it, of the pride I have in the fact that I am a Confederate soldier. Whatever else we may have lost in that struggle, we gave the world Robert E. Lee, and he led an army with a record of valour that will preserve its memory as long as the world counts courage and self-sacrifice among the noblest traits of men.

So let not my reader expect to hear from me any explanations or regrets about my having been a so-called Rebel. That is just what I was, and while I do not want to flaunt the fact offensively in the face of anybody who felt differently, I must admit to this day I am proud of my record as a follower of Lee.

All that was a long time ago, and those who felt most bitterly about it are now reconciled, but there is one exception to the general amnesty of the Northern mind which I cannot for the life of me understand, and that is why, when the Northern people seem to have forgiven all other Confederates, they still in some indefinable way and for some inexplicable reason cherish a grudge against Mr. Davis, as if he were called upon to make vicarious atonement for the sins of all the rest of us. What did he do that keeps him without the pale of Northern charity? He certainly was not so pre-eminently great that he led his people against their will. He was not so popular that he might mislead them. He was neither so good that he did the North unusual damage, nor so bad that he excited their special vengeance. Their attitude toward him only excites sympathy among his old comrades, with whom he was never a favourite, and makes a soft place for him in the heart of every ex-Confederate.

Mr. Davis was never a particular friend to me or mine. I never believed he was a great man, or even the best President the Confederate States might have had. But he was our President. Whatever shortcomings he may have had, he was a brave, conscientious and loyal son of the South. He did his best, to the utmost of his ability, for the Southern cause. He, without being a whit worse than the rest of us, was made to suffer for us as no other man in the Confederacy. And through it all he never, to the day of his death, failed to maintain the honour and dignity confided to his keeping.

Yet the North seems not to have forgiven him. For that very reason I cherish his memory with peculiar tenderness. After forty years of renewed loyalty to our re-united country, in which I have battled for the acceptance in good faith by the Southern people of the results of war; after seeing, with loyal pride, my sons bearing to victory the flag against which I fought, I feel that I have a right to stand up anywhere and demand for the memory of Jefferson Davis just as much kindness, just as much charity and just as much forgiveness as is accorded to the memories of Lee or Johnston or any of the great Confederate heroes. I believe that his courageous and constant soul is at rest in a heaven somewhere provided for brave and loyal spirits whose reward does not depend upon success, or even upon whether they were in fact right or wrong, but upon their having striven in this world for what they believed was right according to the power God gave them to see the right. And that is what I believe Mr. Davis did.

For several centuries the Woodrow family has been distinguished for learning, piety and able public service. Patrick Wodrow, a Roman Catholic priest, was one of the first men of prominence in Scotland to embrace the doctrines of Protestantism. From that day to the present, every generation of the family has produced one or more ministers of the Gospel, conspicuous among them being Professor James Wodrow, the professor of Theology in Glasgow University, one of the ablest theologians of the Seventeenth Century. In the family was the militant blood of Robert the Bruce, and as that blood coursed through the veins of confessors of the Reformation period, it was refined to a higher quality of devotion to right, patient endurance, indomitable perseverance, and tolerant charity.

The Dr. Woodrow of this sketch was an accomplished scholar in law, medicine, the natural sciences and theology, and he was also an adept in business. The superiority of his scholarship was fully recognized in the world of education and research. Upon his graduation at Heidelberg, he was offered a full professorship there, a rare tribute to an American from a German university. In earlier years he had been a pupil of Louis Agassiz and a warm friendship was maintained between the two throughout the life of Agassiz. His information was not altogether derived from books, for he studied Nature for himself at first hand. He made one quite notable contribution to Science by discovering near Dresden, Saxony, the fossil called calamites gigas. Geologists had hitherto looked in vain for a specimen of this fossil, and it was useful in fixing the age of the rock in which it was found.

He spent nearly a half century in education, first in private academies in Alabama, afterward as a professor of Natural Science at Oglethorpe University in Georgia, then, in Columbia, South Carolina, as professor in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary and the State College. Of this last institution, he finally became president. Upon the steady stream of students passing through his life, he left the impress of a commanding personality. Sidney Lanier was his most distinguished pupil. Upon Lanier's graduation at Oglethorpe University, Professor Woodrow secured his appointment as a tutor there. A congenial and affectionate intimacy arose between them. In their leisure hours they strolled the woods and the fields together, and Lanier often accompanied Professor Woodrow on long drives to his preaching appointments in the country. Delightful and useful conversation filled the time. Dr. Woodrow writes with enthusiasm of Lanier's charming society and "marvelous flute playing," and Lanier calls him "the strongest and most valuable stimulus of his youth." He also says "I am more indebted to Dr. Woodrow than to any living man, for shaping my mental attitude toward nature and life. His spirit and method had a formative influence on my thought and fancy in all my literary work."

It was while he was teaching at Oglethorpe that Professor Woodrow entered the ministry in the Presbyterian Church in order that he might preach to the large number of destitute points within driving distance of the University. In 1860, he was called to fill a new chair that had been established in Columbia Theological Seminary, that of 'Natural Science in Connexion with Revelation.' In organizing this new department, he had no precedents to guide him, for there was no similar professorship in any institution. Youth though he was, the responsible task fell to him of giving form and character to an entirely new enterprise in academic instruction. But he was preëminently fitted for the work. He had a passion for truth. Natural Science was his specialty, and he had been trained in it by the ablest instructors in America and Europe. On the other hand, he had an absolute conviction of the plenary inspiration (or, as he expressed it, 'the absolute inerrancy of every expression') of the Bible—the original manuscripts, of course. Love for truth, and reverence for the Word of God, were recognized as the most pronounced features of his character. To him the Bible was the best authenticated and the highest truth available by man, because it had been given of God to correct the mistakes of reason blinded by sin. Between Nature and the Bible there could be no conflict, because both emanated from the same source, from the God of Truth, the Omniscient. There might be a seeming contradiction, but the appearance of contradiction arose from one or both of two causes. It came from either a misunderstanding of Nature, or a wrong interpretation of the Bible. A fuller knowledge of one or the other, therefore, was sure to remove the appearance of conflict. What was distinctive of his teaching in this direction (and it was probably original with him) was the distinction upon which he insisted between harmony, and the absence of contradiction. He disavowed any effort to establish harmony between Science and the Bible, and confined himself to removing the appearance of contradiction. Both the subject-matter and the purpose of Science and Revelation are so entirely different that harmony is not to be expected. The object of Science is to ascertain the facts and laws of matter. The object of the Bible is to inform man how he may be saved, how sin may be forgiven, how he may be recovered from sin, and how he may regain the lost favor and image of God—only this, nothing else. One might therefore with as much propriety speak of a harmony between the multiplication table and one of the odes of Horace as to speak of harmony between Science and Revelation, because they occupy totally different spheres. Yet the Bible must make mention of natural objects, and its statements or implications about these may appear to conflict with the teachings of Science. He assumed it to be the object of his professorship to deal exclusively with such instances of apparent conflict and to show that the conflict was only apparent. To do this he expounded to his students the teachings of Science that were supposed to antagonize the Bible. He did this candidly, fearlessly, according to the rules of scientific investigation, without any effort to distort the results to adapt them to preconceived opinions derived from the Bible or any other source. It was Science for Science sake, to ascertain with scrupulous precision exactly what Science taught, as if there had been no Revelation. Then he expounded in the same manner the teachings of the Scripture that were supposed to be antagonized. His object was to define the intended meaning of the passage in accordance with accepted rules of interpretation, just as candidly and fearlessly as he had scrutinized Science, and just as independently of opinions formed elsewhere. There was a sacred avoidance of all effort to distort the meaning to make it accord with Science. His only question was, What was the meaning intended in this place, by the Holy Ghost who gave it? The two teachings were then compared, generally resulting in a convincing demonstration of the absence of contradiction. But great emphasis was continually placed upon the principle that if the appearance of conflict did not disappear, the Bible statement was decisive, since that was the Word of God and the other was an inference of man. Many a young man of vigorous intellect, chafing under authority of Revelation, resolved to know the facts, unable to solve these deep problems for himself, was saved from skepticism by his clear, well-informed, convincing discussion of these points. His intellect, his knowledge of the facts, his limpid candor, his profound Christian faith gave him a rare influence over young men. Yet he abhorred a sycophant, and equally so the professor who would use his position to force his own opinions on others. He sought to develop in young men a sense of responsibility for their own opinions and a capacity to form them intelligently. It should be added that mature students and teachers of Science were often brought to embrace the Christian faith by such expositions of the relations of Science to Revelation, in his writings, his correspondence and his personal association.

At the breaking out of the war between the States, he enlisted as a private soldier in the Confederate Army, but before seeing actual service, he was appointed to take charge of the Government's plant for the manufacture of medicines in Columbia. Having expert and practical knowledge of the subject, he conducted the work successfully and held the position until the close of the war.

When the war ended he was one of the first to address himself with energy and confidence to recovery from the disaster of defeat, and he helped to inspire his fellow countrymen with hope and courage. It was at this time he secured the Southern Presbyterian, a weekly religious paper, hauling the modest outfit on a mule cart from Augusta, Georgia, to Columbia, South Carolina, himself driving the mule, walking by its side, and even putting his own shoulder to the wheel when necessary in rough places. As long as he conducted this paper, a period of nearly thirty years, he made it a commanding power among its constituency. Among the discouraged friends of the Theological Seminary, he urged that it be immediately reopened. He also became the proprietor and editor of the Southern Presbyterian Review, a quarterly magazine of his church.

He had an enormous capacity for work and an unusual aptitude for business. He established a publishing house in Columbia, which attracted to itself a large volume of the best and most remunerative business in the State. For years he held the contract for the official printing of the State. Though he allowed no printing on Sunday, but closed his place of business from twelve o'clock Saturday night until twelve o'clock Sunday night, there never was complaint of a single job being delivered too late or printed in an unsatisfactory manner.

He was also treasurer of the benevolent work of the Southern Presbyterian Church. Notwithstanding his many and varied other duties, he did this responsible work with accuracy, promptness and sound judgment. On one occasion, when the managers of these beneficences lost a large sum of money by acting contrary to his advice, he replaced it from his private means and mortgaged his home to do it.

He also taught geology and mineralogy in the South Carolina College. During a part of the time he was the center of a violent theological controversy, throughout which he defended himself with dignity and consummate ability.

When the South Carolina University was to be reorganized as a college amidst political bitterness and dissension, he was called to the work as president of the institution. At first but few students came and the prospects were gloomy. He quietly set to work to make the institution of such a character as to command patronage and soon the patronage came and the College was saved. After six years he resigned on account of approaching age, but his colleagues continued for years to recall and act upon his policies and views. Another indication of his standing as a business man was his serving at two different times as president of one of the strongest banks in Columbia and his official relation to a number of business enterprises in the city. He acquired considerable property, a great deal of which was spent in unobtrusive charities.

Naturally frail, with a feeble voice and a shrinking timidity of manner, by careful and persistent self-culture he became a powerful speaker, a ready and successful debater, and a leader in all the deliberative bodies in which he sat. Among the scientific subjects he discussed before his theological students was that of evolution.

He did not believe in it, but merely discussed its relation to the Bible account of creation. He firmly believed that the Bible revealed merely the fact of creation and not the mode. In the course of time, in response to an invitation of the directors of the Seminary, he delivered before them an address on evolution. While reviewing the whole subject, to prepare for that address, he became convinced that evolution was the mode by which God created the earth, the lower animals and the body of Adam. He still adhered to his firm conviction that there was nothing in the Bible to forbid his so believing, and declared that he would instantly renounce the belief if it could be satisfactorily shown to him that the Bible did forbid it. A bitter controversy arose in his church about this question and it resulted in his being excluded from his professor's chair, but left his standing as a Christian minister unaffected.

He died January 17, 1907. The simple and appropriate inscription on his tomb is,

"Having served his generation by the will of God, he fell on sleep."

WARNINGS OF THE WORD

From a Baccalaureate Address to the Students of South Carolina College, June 27, 1892.

HAVING thus warned us against violations of the first and great commandment, the word puts us on our guard also against the transgressions of the second, to which the Omniscient Eye sees we are prone.

You are now near an age at which you will no longer be under the legal control of father and mother; but the day will never come when you will not owe love and honor to those who so eagerly welcomed you at your birth. The frivolous, foolish, light-minded youth sometimes forgets this; but the guiding word is at hand to recall him from his ingratitude by this first commandment with promise.

As the youth mingles day by day with his fellow-men, he is sure not infrequently to meet with those who disregard his rights, it may be with some who offer him insult or do him wanton injury, or in other ways excite him into flaming anger. Tempted by his unrestrained passion to avenge himself, he attacks the offender, he is ready even to take his life. His monitor's voice may then be heard, "Thou shalt not kill." "Avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath." "Say not thou, I will recompense evil; but wait on the Lord, and he shall save thee." It goes further, and warns against the cause of murder. You are told that hatred, malice, desire for revenge, lead to murder; that in the sight of God they are murder. Let this advice be heeded, and murder, in thought as well as in the shedding of blood, must disappear from the earth: "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice; and be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."

But besides the temptations which assail the young man, inciting him to anger and unrestrained wrath, to murder in thought if not in deed, there are others which beset him on every side, seeking to entice him from the paths of purity by every alluring promise, inflaming him by the prospect of unholy pleasures to walk in forbidden ways, while skilfully concealing the death in which they end. Against these the guide utters precept after precept, warning after warning, in tones of entreaty and expostulation that surely the most insensible must hear. The folly, the danger, the sin are shown; woe to him who hears and heeds not; who, void of understanding, listens to the stranger with flattering words, forsaking the guide of her youth; who enters the house that inclineth unto death, and paths that descend unto the dead; who goes, as an ox goeth to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks; deaf to the warning that they are in the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death; not knowing that the dead are there, and that they are amongst guests who are in the depths of hell. Nor are the warnings given against outward acts alone, but the youth is also cautioned against the wanton look, imagination, or desire; so earnestly, that he is urged, if his right eye do cause him to offend, to pluck it out and cast it from him; for the reason that it is better to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye than having two eyes, to be cast into hell fire.

In taking your places amongst men, no longer to be directly dependent upon others for your support, you expect to seek, with other good things, the possession of property; by your labor and skill, you look forward to making your own living by engaging in some kind of business, and even to accumulate wealth, if you can. And the word I am commending to you as your guide does not forbid or discourage such desires; it encourages them instead, and shows how they may most effectively be realised. It describes riches as a good—not the highest, by any means—but still as good; and then it tells how they may be gained—namely, by diligence, industry, thrift. The hand of the diligent maketh rich. He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread. In all labor there is profit. Seest thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men. We command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread.

Then as a rule to control us in our gains, as part of that which bids love to our neighbors as ourselves, it gives us this: "Thou shalt not steal." Possibly we may at first be inclined to resent the giving of such a rule to us. But let us remember that this commandment, like all the others, is exceeding broad.

It does not merely forbid one's being a vulgar thief; but it forbids our doing anything and everything that directly or indirectly interferes with the rights of our neighbors or in any way regards them less sacred than our own. It forbids not merely embezzlement, the gaining of money by false pretences, fraud, cheating, gaming, taking advantage of others, but also all misappropriation or waste of the money of others, whether those others are private persons, corporations, or the State. It requires the most scrupulous integrity. It requires the payment of debts, and the prompt payment of them. It requires a strict observance of all contracts in their true meaning. It requires perfect honesty and uprightness in the sight of men and of God who sees and knows our inmost thoughts. By taking heed to these requirements, the young man will effectually cleanse his way in respect to all these things.

But there are still other directions in which protection from defilement is needed. There is one evil to which the corrupt heart is especially prone, which combines with all others, which towers above most others in its enormity, and of which God expresses his peculiar abhorrence. It is the sin of falsehood. Temptations to commit most other sins are not constantly assailing you; you are hardly ever free for a moment from temptation to commit this one. Bearing false witness against our neighbor is the form of it mentioned in the Ten Words; but this includes every form. That against which we are warned is falsehood, deceit, lying, hypocrisy, misrepresentation, dissimulation, perjury—all and every departure from perfect and absolute truth. Now, the word to which the young man is invited to take heed is full of incentives of every kind to lead him to hate and avoid the false, to love and practise the true. It declares that lying lips are an abomination to the Lord; that the Lord hates the lying tongue; that all liars have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone; that into the holy city, the New Jerusalem, there shall in no wise enter anything that maketh a lie; that without are dogs, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie. It sets forth not only God's hatred and detestation of lying, but that which is felt also by all good men. Then, on the other hand, it holds up to view the beauty and attractiveness of truth, and exalts the character of him who speaks the truth. This is the answer to the question, "Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill?" "He that speaketh the truth in his heart; he that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not. He that doeth these things shall never be moved." And "they that deal truly are his delight."

What a changed world this would be if the truth and nothing but the truth were spoken; if slander, detraction, malicious gossip, evil-speaking of every kind, were unknown. How far can you rely on the representations of the seller of property as to its real value and its defects? How many buyers are there who say, It is naught, it is naught; but who when they have gone away, utter their boastings? How far can you trust the statements even of one who professes to be contending for the truth of God, when he formulates the creed and describes the practices of an antagonist? How much have we a right to believe of the assertions of a political partisan respecting the principles of the other party, the character and aims of the other candidate, the probable result of the coming election? How can we learn the number of soldiers engaged in certain battles and wars? So we might go over the whole range of human affairs, and ask, Where can truth be found? The world is covered with wrecks resulting from broken promises, deceit, falsehood, and treachery.

The tenth utterance in that part of the word we are considering, to which the young man does well to take heed, specifically forbids an unlawful desire for that to which we have no right; but it is based on the broader thought which the Lord Jesus Christ, himself the divine Word, so fully brought to view in his teachings while on earth. It is the state of the heart that determines the outward act; and even if not followed by the outward evil act is itself sin—uncleanness. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. The unlawful desire leads to murder, to theft, to impurity, to lying; it leads away from the love of God. As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he.

In seeking to cleanse our way, therefore, it is not enough to consider the stream; we must more earnestly strive to secure purity at the source, the fountain head. As is the source, such will be the stream; as is the heart, such will be the life.

A SPEECH BEFORE THE STUDENTS OF SOUTH CAROLINA COLLEGE

[One day while the students were engaged in athletic sports on the college playground, the State militia, commanded by the Adjutant and Inspector-general, came on the ground to drill. When the students refused to yield the ground, the troops were ordered to clear the field. One of the professors was seriously hurt, and one of the students lay at the point of death, as the result of the attack. Dr. Woodrow, the President, who was absent, returned that night. The next morning he assembled the students and made the speech given here. The intense excitement was quieted immediately, and the settlement was confided entirely to their President.]

"YOUNG GENTLEMEN: Upon my return home, I learned what happened to you and one of your number in my absence. I was inexpressibly shocked to learn that the very grounds which had been set apart for your amusement and pleasure were ruthlessly and violently invaded by armed force, and that one of your honored professors was run over and came near being seriously injured, and that one of your number now lies perhaps at the point of death. When I consider that this insolent and dastardly trespass was committed by some of the public officials of our State, by those who are especially charged, by their oath under the law, to protect the lives and rights of our people, when I consider that you were, as it were, in your own castle, upon your own land, my indignation rises almost beyond bounds. That defenseless and innocent boys should be driven from their own playground by a body of armed soldiery, that the head of the military department of the State gave the order to these soldiers to drive you from your own playground, is a black and indelible blot upon the good name of South Carolina. If boys should fall out and fight among themselves, I would blame both sides; and if men should dispute and engage in a personal difficulty, I know that each would be partially at fault; but here, while you were engaged in a pleasant and proper pastime, for the rest of your minds and the strengthening of your bodies, while you were where you ought to be, and behaving as you ought to behave, to be encroached upon, assaulted, and swept from the field by organised, armed soldiery, is a crime upon civilisation. I pledge you here now as the humble servant of this State, and as in a sense your protector, that this insult and wrong shall not go unavenged, but that the people of this State shall know how great has been your provocation, and how unjust has been your suffering. I pledge you that the people of this State shall have the information from which they may come to a proper conclusion, and place the responsibility for this outrage where it belongs, and give censure to whom censure is due.

"I have spoken not to inflame, but to console; not to arouse your passions, but to approve your conduct. I beg now that you leave to me and to others in authority the solemn duty to place the blame on those responsible for this affair, and that your resentment be not permitted to lead you into any indiscreet and unwise conduct. Let older and wiser heads deal with this situation, and the outcome is bound to result in your vindication and in the condemnation of others."

SPEECH BEFORE THE SYNOD OF SOUTH CAROLINA IN DEFENSE OF HIS POSITION ON EVOLUTION

[An address on Evolution had been delivered before the Board of Directors and the Alumni Association of Columbia Seminary at the request of those bodies. The Directors had expressed their satisfaction with his exposition of the relation of the subject to the Scripture account of creation, that relation being one of the absence of contradiction. The Synod of South Carolina was one of four Synods that controlled the Seminary. An effort was made at the next meeting of that Synod to reverse the action of the Directors. Selections from Dr. Woodrow's speech on that occasion are here given.]

MUCH of the difficulty on this subject arises from the failure to perceive that evolution and Scripture do not stand in opposition to one another. I know that it is supposed that if one believes in evolution in one sense, he must believe it in every sense. No argument I think is necessary to prove that that is not the case. Is it true that what Haeckel believes as to evolution, I must likewise believe? Must I believe what Herbert Spencer and Darwin believe, because I have declared that I regard something else as probably true? So you have been told; and has it not been proved by quotations from the Southwestern Presbyterian to show that whatever Darwin believes I also believe? You have heard seven reasons given, drawn from that source, to prove that what Darwin believed I believe; although I have kept saying, "I don't" and I say so still, the seven reasons of the Southwestern Presbyterian to the contrary notwithstanding. I ask you if it is fair, or right to attribute to me views that I utterly disclaim? I do not say that this is done through either inability to understand or a desire to misinterpret; but I ask if it is fair or just that I should be held responsible for views that I absolutely abhor, and which I have proved over and over again that I do not hold? I know and knew the difficulties surrounding the subject; and therefore in preparing my Address I took the precaution, before giving my opinion upon evolution, to state as accurately as I could what I meant by it. I gave my definition of evolution, which, as it relates to the organic world, is contained in the three words, "Descent with Modification." That is, as animals and plants descend from generation to generation, at length modifications appear. In my definition I do not say anything of the power under whose influence the modifications appear. So far as the earth is concerned, I define evolution as derivation of one state from another previous state, such as is illustrated in the résumé I give of the nebular hypothesis. That is to say, evolution is simply a process, a description of a mode according to which changes take place, not a description of the power which produces the changes. On this point I shall read what I have written:

"This definition or description of evolution does not include any reference to the power by which the origination is effected; it refers to the mode, and to the mode alone. So far as the definition is concerned, the immediate existence might be attributed to God or to chance; the derived existence to inherent uncreated law, or to an almighty personal Creator, acting according to laws of his own framing. It is important to consider this distinction carefully, for it is wholly inconsistent with much that is said and believed by both advocates and opponents of evolution. It is not unusual to represent Creation and Evolution as mutually exclusive, as contradictory: Creation meaning the immediate calling out of non-existence by divine power; Evolution, derivation from previous forms or states by inherent, self-originated, or eternal laws, independent of all connection with divine personal power. Hence, if this is correct, those who believe in Creation are theists; those who believe in Evolution are atheists. But there is no propriety in thus mingling in the definition two things which are so completely different as the power that produces an effect, and the mode in which the effect is produced."

Moderator, knowing that that was what I had believed and maintained, and knowing that I had so explicitly repudiated all atheistic forms of evolution, I could not but spring to my feet when I heard two or three days ago, for the first time, that which I had denounced as atheism attributed to me. If I erred in my vehemence in repelling the charge, I crave your forgiveness.

Perhaps it may be well to make clear by an illustration that which may be too abstract for ready comprehension by those who have not studied such subjects. Take an oak, for instance. First observe the acorn. You notice that under the influence of heat and moisture it begins to swell. Then little leaves make their appearance; then these leaves are repeated and repeated until at last the full-grown oak stands before you. Let us now try to see what is the religious character of the process of this growth. Is the passage from the acorn to the oak a religious or an irreligious process? Do I need to show that the idea that it was God who made the acorn develop into the oak is not involved in the description of this process? So the idea of God is not involved in the definition which I have given of evolution.

DR. JUNKIN: I desire to ask for my own information this question; Does this process of evolution which you have thus described carry with it the presumption of a growth from one form of life into another? That is, does it carry along with it the presumption of divine Power or supervision in the change from vegetable to animal life; or is that done without the immediate intervention of a divine creative act?

DR. WOODROW: As to that I would have to answer at length, instead of saying yes or no. In describing the changes from the acorn to the oak, I am stating the results of observation. So if that particular oak gives rise to a slightly different form, I simply note that as a fact. I am not then considering the power that has produced the changes when I am merely describing the changes. The mere observation of the process or mode by which the acorn becomes an oak, does not tell me whether it is God who is the cause of the change or not. So the observation of cases in which I observe modification during descent tells me nothing of the power producing the observed changes. Within the limits of natural science, it is only the natural or the ordinary—that which occurs uniformly—that can rightly be considered. All else the student of natural science would regard as extraordinary or extra-natural, and so beyond his province. If he should speak of the supernatural, he would be going beyond his province.

Speaking of the processes or modes, it is true that a knowledge of them depends on observation, which teaches us nothing of their origin; but so soon as I have learned from other sources that there is a God; that there is a being, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in wisdom, power, and all his attributes; and when I know the relations of this being to the universe, his workmanship, then I perceive that this process of change from acorn to oak is his mode of working—that every step in the process is the working of an almighty and all-wise God. And so when I come as a believer in God to the study of those things which I now begin to call the works of God, I find him present in a way that I had never imagined before. When I look at the quivering leaf growing under the influences of the sunshine and the rain, I see before me God's power effecting the wonderful changes that are there taking place; I see the present power of that God directing and guiding its faintest movement. When I see the dew-drop resting on the blade of grass reflecting from its surface the prismatic hues, I see not proofs of the existence of a distant or absent God; I see his hand there immediately present holding the particles together, for my delight as one of his ends; causing the white ray of light to be broken up into the marvellous rainbow colors so as to charm the sense of sight; it is God who is doing this before me. As I look abroad upon the operations of nature on a grander scale—when I stand in the presence of the mountain and behold the veil of blinding snow on its summit, I see there the power of God holding particle to particle and producing that which fills my mind with awe; that which expands my soul and gives me a new and an exalted idea of the mighty Creator—not in whom we did live, but in whom we now live and in whom we have our being, who is now causing every pulse-beat in this wrist, who is now giving me the power to be heard by you. He is a God near at hand; he is not a God afar off. This, I say, is the Christian's view of God and his relation to his works. Can you imagine, then, if this is true and not a mere fancy, can you imagine that when I, so believing, speak of evolution, or when any right-thinking man speaks of it, he is pushing God away and doing that which tends to materialism, or to a blank denial of the existence of the Almighty? Need I now undertake further to prove that Evolution is not antagonistic to Creation; that Evolution is Creation?

If anything more is needed, let me ask you again the question which I have heard so frequently during the last day or two: "Who made you?" I don't mean who made several ages ago those from whom you have descended, but who made you? Are you an orphan so far as the Creator of the universe is concerned, or is God your Father and Creator? Are you going to allow someone to come here and say that because he did not create you immediately, he did not create you at all? No; you have as much claim to him as your Father as Adam had. But did he make you immediately? Oh no, he did not. Yet, for all this, no one is willing to give up his right to say "Our Father" and "Our Creator." Creation is not antagonistic to our evolution. God may create out of nothing; but so far as the daily operations of his hands are concerned, we see that he does not create out of nothing, but out of something that he had previously brought out of nothing. But he is not the less creating before our eyes. There is no antagonism between Creation and that mode of Creation which we call Evolution.

You will now better understand why I should say that I want no change in the expression of the Confession: "After God had made all other creatures, he created man." The only difference between us is as to the probable mode of that creation.

I wish, in the next place, to call attention to the fact that it has been constantly reiterated that I subordinate Scripture to science. The only answer that I have for that statement is that it is not true. I cannot give any explanation of the matter except just that. I say that there is not a word that I ever spoke, or wrote, or thought, that would bear that construction; and anyone who has read what I have written ought to know that it is not true. I have always sought to know what the Scriptures teach with regard to any matter that I was examining; and when I have found the meaning of the Scriptures, I have accepted that as final. I say again that there is not a syllable I ever uttered, or a word I ever spoke, that could even remotely sanction any such construction. When I said that I believed it to be probably true that Adam's body was included in the method of mediate creation, it was only after I had shown that it might not be inconsistent with the Sacred Scriptures. (Here a motion was made that the Synod adjourn. Lost by a large majority.)

* * * * *

Moderator, I am told that in the contest now in progress I stand alone; that no one stands beside me, or believes with me. Now, if there is anything for which I yearn, after the love of God and of Jesus Christ my Saviour, it is the love and approbation of the good, the pure, the upright, of those who bear the image of God in their hearts. And I know that isolation is desolation. But if I must stand alone in defence of what I believe to be His truth, I submit to the decree and to the will of my God. I will not be the first who has seemed to stand alone. As I look through the vistas opened before me by the word of God, I see the forms of three who were cast alone into the furnace of fire heated seven times more than it was wont to be heated. But as I look again, they are not alone, for four are walking in the midst of the fire; and when they came forth from that furnace not even the smell of fire had passed on them. I remember also that when an apostle was once called to stand before Nero, all men forsook him; but yet he was not alone. As I look in another direction, I see a form standing alone, in the presence of a mighty emperor and the princes of the empire, and saying, all alone as he seemed to be, "with regard to the charges against me, if any man can prove that they are true by the word of God, I will repent and recant; but until then, here I stand, I cannot otherwise; God help me. Amen." And so stand I.

But, Moderator, I do not believe, with regard to the only point concerning which I care, comparatively, in this whole discussion, that any such loneliness even as to the human kind is in store for me.

In the next place, we are told that evolution is to be rejected, because it is born of atheism. It is said that many atheists hold the doctrine of evolution, and therefore it is not true. Darwin was not an atheist, but at the same time he was not a believer in Christianity. But how does that affect the truth of evolution? On the other hand, we know that there are many others who believe in evolution who are not atheists. If others say it leads to atheism, I say it does not; and I content myself with pronouncing their proposition an "unverified hypothesis."

Then you are told that it assigns a beastly origin to man. Well, we need not be so proud. We have bodies exactly like the beasts, if you choose to call them so. Our muscles are arranged in the same way. The heart beats in the dog just as it beats in me. His legs are made like mine and like my arms. He has a brain in his skull and a spinal marrow. He digests as I do. He does everything in the same way. Again, as to our instincts being shocked: what is there in red clay that is so much more noble than the most highly organised form God had made up to the time of Adam? You have only the choice between red clay and the highest and best thing that was produced by the power of God up to the time of man's existence. And if your decision is to be controlled by your prejudices and your instincts and your feelings, let me ask you, Moderator, how do you like to think that the negro is your brother? Is your instinct shocked by that? Will you follow instincts in one case and not follow them in another?

* * * * *

The only thing, Moderator, that you have a right to inquire into, as to any proposition, is whether it is scriptural or not; and it is only so far as anything agrees with the Holy Word that you may adopt it, and it is only when it is inconsistent with the Holy Word that you may condemn it, when sitting as a church court. There is much truth that is not contained in the Scriptures; but with it you have nothing to do. Otherwise, why should not the Church adopt the multiplication table, or some good treatise on algebra, as matters of faith, simply because they are true?

Are there those in this Synod who still desire that it shall be put on record as undertaking to decide a scientific problem, without the slightest opinion expressed as to its agreement or disagreement with the word of God? It is not competent to you, I say again, to decide such a question without going beyond the limits of your authority, and legislating with reference to things which the Head of the Church has not intrusted to you. You have no right to go a single step beyond the boundaries which I have pointed out.

* * * * *

I have already intimated that in my opinion evolution—its truth or falsity—is a matter of extremely small importance. I think that, as regards your Christian character, it does not make the slightest difference whether you believe in evolution or not. I have said directly and by implication over and over again, that the Church may not teach science, even what would be admitted by all to be true science, so far as such teaching would imply that that science is sanctioned by the Church. It makes no difference, as to the doctrines of the Christian Church whether one believes the Ptolemaic doctrine of the solar system, or whether he believes the earth to be round or flat, or, as I think, whether he regards evolution to be probably true or an unverified hypothesis. Scientific beliefs, even those which are in some respects of the highest consequence, when they are compared with the doctrines with which the Church of God is concerned, and which alone it is commissioned to teach, are of utter insignificance.

It is for you now to keep the Church from being again dragged down from its sublime and sacred work, as it has so often been in the past. The Church in various ways has uttered its belief on one scientific question after another during the past; and I think I am right when I assert that every time the Church has undertaken to express an opinion on scientific matters, it has expressed an opinion that was wrong. And what, Moderator, is the sad result? In every land where knowledge prevails, just in proportion frequently to the extent of the knowledge is the extent of the rejection of the Holy Scriptures. How could it well be otherwise? When you go into a church and hear denounced from the pulpit as false those things which you know to be true, are you going to believe the Bible to be the word of God on such authority as that? The authorised interpreter of the word, speaking in the name of the Church, tells you that geology is not true, that astronomy is not true, and that you must reject such things as contrary to the inspired word of God. Is it a wonder, Moderator, that those who know the truth are driven by such teaching into utter rejection of the Bible, and so from hope and down to hell? And by whom? By all, Moderator, who insist on maintaining that there is a struggle, an opposition, an enmity, between that science which is derived from the word of God and the science which is derived from His works. It will be an awful and a terrible thing in the day of judgment to have the blood of such men, Moderator, on our souls. The evils to which I am calling your attention are increasing every day. A larger and larger proportion of the truest and the noblest of our youth are coming every day to understand and to know the truths of natural science; and just in proportion as it is asserted from the pulpit that natural science and the teachings of the Bible contradict each other, just in that proportion will unbelief and its fearful consequences increase. I will venture to say that there is scarcely a community in this State where you cannot find one who utterly rejects the Sacred Scriptures and Jesus Christ for this reason. Can anyone say that such an effect has ever been produced by the teachings which have been denounced here as contrary to the word of God?

Moderator and Brethren, you now have one of the grandest opportunities that could be presented of maintaining the pure spirituality and exclusive scriptural character of the Church. As you look backward over the dreary past, you will see that it has been taught in the Church's name that if you believe that human beings live beyond the torrid zone, you must reject the Scriptures as false; if you believe that the earth is a sphere, you must reject the Scriptures as false; if you believe that the sun does not revolve around the earth but that the earth revolves around the sun, you must reject the Scriptures as false; if you believe that the universe was created more than six thousand years ago, you must reject the Scriptures as false. Will you add to this dismal list of appalling examples your teaching, that if you believe that evolution is true, you must reject the Scriptures as false?

I beseech you that you abstain from speaking as rulers in the Church of Christ that which the Head of the Church has not authorised you in His word to speak. I beseech you that you will not place deadly stumbling blocks in the path of those who are seeking the way of life in the Holy Word. For the sake of the intelligent ingenuous youth of the land, for the sake of the greater multitudes who will look to them as their guides, that you may not drive to eternal death those whom you would fain win to eternal blessedness, I beseech you that you will not tell them in Christ's name that if they accept the teachings of God's works, they can have no share in the unspeakable blessings offered in God's word. By your love for the souls of your fellow-men, by your loyalty to the King and Lord of the Church and your desire to obey Him by keeping within the limits which He has prescribed to you, as you would glorify Him by bringing souls into His kingdom, I beseech you as His representatives, do not commit Him to what He has not commanded, but preach the word, and the word alone.

KATHARINE PEARSON WOODS

[1853—]

FANNIE K. REICHE

"Fame comes only when deserved, and then is as inevitable as destiny, for it is destiny."—Longfellow.

KATHARINE PEARSON WOODS, novelist, historian, and poet, was born in Wheeling, West Virginia, January 28, 1853, and because of her remarkable achievements in the field of literature, ranks preëminently among representative writers of the South.

In 1856 her parents removed to Baltimore, Maryland, in connection with which city she is best known. Her work shows, however, that her forbears were pioneers from whom descended to Katharine Woods a broadmindedness, a complete sense of the fitness of things—the juxtaposition of principles and events in the great economy of God and nature—the power to review with impartiality, and impersonally—the power of analysis—to seek out the root and its ramifications.

From the maternal side of the house, from the McCabes, she has inherited what is in no sense secondary to, nor less rare than, the legacy from the house of her paternal ancestors—the deep religious and spiritual intuitiveness which is perhaps the most striking and significant characteristic of her works. This, with the literary ability itself, pure and simple, was inborn in the sons and daughters of the house of McCabe for generations past, and the gift descended thus undiminished and untarnished to Katharine Woods.

It was in 1675 that the first of this family, Owen McCabe, came to America, holding a grant of land under William Penn, and settling in western Pennsylvania. He named his ample estate Tyrone, after his native place in Ireland, and to-day the picturesque town of Tyrone stands on a portion of the original grant. The McCabes were Irish Protestants and lacked not the wit, tenderness, the love of home and country that characterize the race.

During the French and Indian War the grandson of Owen McCabe, Captain James McCabe, or "Pat," as the men of his regiment nicknamed him, was one of General Montgomery's staff, and later was mentioned in the diary of General Washington. After the Revolution, during which conflict he equipped a company at his own expense and fought for the colonies and independence, he sold Tyrone and removed to Virginia.

When but nine years of age, immediately after the death of her father in Baltimore, Katharine Woods removed with her mother to the home of her grandfather, the Rev. James Dabney McCabe, Rector of St. James's Church, West River, Anne Arundel County, Maryland, who was one of the most gifted and well-known clergymen of his day. The atmosphere of this home was both literary and religious, which, together with unchecked intercourse with nature, could not but influence one already both receptive and keenly responsive to such environment, out of which a few years later grew the missionary spirit that has dominated all she has written, and every work she has undertaken.

In October, 1867, Mrs. Woods removed with her family to Baltimore, in order to take advantage of greater educational facilities for her children; but owing to frail health, Katharine did not attend school until three years later, when she entered the seminary of Mrs. Converse and Miss Miller, the latter a former pupil of Harriet Beecher Stowe.

In 1872 the All Saints' Sisters—a religious order in the Anglican Church—came to Baltimore from England, and began its work at Mount Calvary Protestant Episcopal Church, of which Miss Woods was an active member. Day by day mission work claimed more and more of her attention, and so engrossed did she become that she entered the sisterhood of All Saints as a postulant in 1874. As she was of frail physique and in ill-health at the time, both her physician and the Mother Superior deemed it expedient for her to give up the sisterhood forever.

It was within the still, peaceful walls of the convent that the first germs of Christian Socialism took root in the young soul, there blossomed into flower, and, after leaving the convent for the world and its conflict, bore fruit in her work at social settlements and in the productivity of her pen, which she wielded in behalf of the warriors of the forge and the loom, whose champion she has ever been.

In 1876 she taught school at Mount Washington, Maryland, and afterward in Wheeling, West Virginia.

To Miss Woods, Christian Socialism presented itself as applied Christianity, and therefore interested her; but Nationalism, which in 1889, the date of publication of her first book, was sweeping the country, was but transitory; and the conservatism of thought which came from her early education kept her aloof from the organized side of the Nationalist movement; and, although to a certain extent in sympathy with its reforms, she declined to join their clubs or to commit herself to that peculiar program. For a time, however, Miss Woods belonged to a local lodge of the Knights of Labor, and resigned membership only when the lodge withdrew from the National Order. Later, Miss Woods spent a year in settlement work in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Hartford. In 1903-'06 she lived in North Carolina, working as a missionary among the mountaineers. With the exception of the periods just mentioned, Miss Woods has lived in Baltimore, where she is now teaching kindergarten. She loves children; and helping to develop character in real life has always been far more interesting to her than creating it on paper.

Miss Woods states that her books have been but a subsidiary consideration—a means to an end; and she feels as if the very best of herself never got into them. But, as a calm review of her works will show, there is no evidence to prove that such is the case; on the contrary, there is abundant proof that everything she has written bears witness to a loftiness of purpose and living, the seeking for good and the finding it, and the bettering of that which is not all bad—this is her creed of life, as it shines forth from the pages of her books.

Except for the broad, intellectual brow, and a certain light of understanding and infinite tenderness that shines forth from the deep gray eyes, there is nothing about Miss Woods that is indicative of the unusual power she has wielded, not alone as an advocate of reform and reformation as set forth in her books, but by her personality as well. Quiet, retiring, and gentle, with a womanliness that finds its highest realization in the women of the South, and a low voice, whose sweetness or the compelling truth it utters bids us listen, the general refinement of person and manner, and a face in which there is a suggestion of spirituality that her life does not belie—this is Katharine Pearson Woods in the flesh.

Few pictures of Miss Woods ever have been published, nor does she approve of this or of any method of advertising one's productiveness in literature.

Distinguished as are all her works, in conception, plot, and treatment, by a sane, radical, and clear-cut enunciation, at times Miss Woods shows as deep an insight into nature—human and super-human—as George Eliot; her types are distinctive, and because they are real—akin to the great humanity—with its contrasting sunshine and shadow, its joys and its griefs, they will live and be loved.

Miss Woods's prose is marked less by vividness and warmth of coloring, subtle blendings and labyrinthine mazes, than by a certain dignity and mildness of expression, but straightforward and deliberate arrival at the end in view—for never for one moment does she leave us in doubt as to her meaning.

As a historian, it is regrettable that there is but one work to mark her ability. Perhaps one of the most valuable and original features of 'The True Story of Captain John Smith' is her definite identification of the River Bruapo, which countless historians claim had no existence save in the mind of Captain Smith, but which Miss Woods asserts and proves to be the River Don.

In 'The Mark of the Beast,' 'Metzerott, Shoemaker'—considered by many her best work—and 'A Web of Gold,' Miss Woods has espoused the cause of the laborer, in an effort to establish a more amiable and just relationship between capital and labor, and has struck a blow at perverted economic, industrial, and sociological conditions that cannot but undermine the bulwarks of the nation.

These compositions are the romances of the masses—not as a distorted imagination re-creates them, nor as one who knows them, but from a distance views them—but as one who having lived and worked among them has measured their heights and sounded their depths, and laments the great spirit of unrest that pervades alike their communities, and the abodes of the rich and the powerful.

While, to a certain extent, the theories and reforms as advocated in these three works were ideal, they are more in harmony with the thought of to-day than of the day in which they were written—at which time they were far in advance of current thought.

'From Dusk to Dawn' is a forerunner of the Emmanuel movement in that it predicts the necessity for a fuller development of the priestly office in the direction of physical healing; but the theories are behind rather than in advance of theories as set forth to-day, though ahead of the time at which they were written. The definition of matter as "a balance, an equilibrium of forces . . . an equilibrium more or less stable," as it occurs in this work, comes very close to the latest theory in electrical science. The book's original title was 'Salted with Fire,' but was altered to satisfy the publishers, who claimed the title would not be a selling one.

In 'John, a Tale of King Messiah,' and 'A Son of Ingar' Miss Woods has drawn from a quite different store-house—the romance of the Scriptures; and has given to the world stories that make very near and dear the Twelve Apostles and those with whom Christ came into closest contact while on earth, and each is told with dramatic fervor.

In no other work more than in 'The Face of Christ' has she so deftly drawn the strange and subtle power of the inner spirit—that which subdues the world and the flesh, and verily makes the two as dust that crumbles under the force of the power divine. Exquisite in style, there is the very poetry of prose in the well-poised and finely-drawn picture; the whole is a classic, and as a classic will taste of immortality.

As a poet, Miss Woods has been a frequent contributor to magazines, and had she written no prose whereon to base her claim to fame, her poems alone would have won her recognition.

Her songs carry into one's soul the very breath of life and love; they do not plead for a response from our hearts—it greets them ere the mere words are ended. Miss Woods does not write for the poets alone, but for humanity at large; and though one often must needs look below the surface of cursory glances for a fuller and deeper meaning and inspiration, yet the diction itself lacks neither harmony nor directness. There is a message for poet and layman if they but listen, and at the first note they perforce must listen.

Voltaire has said that "All the reasonings of men are not worth one sentiment of women"; and we are reminded of the weight and virtue of this saying of the learned Frenchman when we read such poetry as "Hold Me Not False," "One Poet to Another," "When My Love Sighs," "A Twilight Fantasia," "A Song of Dawn and Springtime," "A Song of Love and Summer," "The Cleansing of Guinevere," "Friar Godfrey's Confession."

The motion, blithesomeness and dignity of poetic expression are present in subdued tones and touches; and this mastery of processes poetic sometimes prevents outbursts of frenzy and lapses into prosiness, which rob poetry of its birthright and its destiny.

THE FACE OF CHRIST

Copyright, E. P. Dutton and Company, and used here by permission of the author and the publishers.

ALL of us have heard the story of the artist who sold his soul to the devil for the power of painting to the life whatever subject he chose; but not all of us know the whole story of the bargain—how it was broken and what happened thereafter, as it is told herein.

His name was Camillo, and there were scenes in his life which he did not care to remember, and which, consequently, he painted over with others even less comforting. At the age of fifty his memory was a charnel-house of dead recollections; his wife had left, his children quarreled with him; most of his friends he had wronged or been wronged by; and he had made a large fortune and a great name for himself. It was not strange, therefore, that at this very period he should be notified by the devil of the termination of their contract, and the consequent immediate foreclosure of the mortgage upon his soul.

The mere idea of such a thing brought out the sweat upon Camillo's forehead; but, having a month allowed him to settle his worldly affairs, he spent one night in tossing sleeplessly between his silken sheets, or restlessly pacing the floors of his luxurious chamber, and another in still wider wanderings over the hills around his villa; the third morning he sent for Padre Antonio, the curé of his native village.

The father had now grown to be an old, old man; but he came at once at the summons of Camillo. The counsel which he gave is a part of the old well-known legend: that the artist should use the skill his contract still insured to him, in painting the Face of Christ.

It was perhaps in virtue of his trained æsthetic sense, perhaps of his ambition, that Camillo decided to paint, not the dying or sorrowful Saviour, which so many artists have attempted and failed, but something still more difficult—the Christ of every-day life. By his contract with the devil he was able to reproduce his subject to the very life. It was a wonderful picture. Just what form the features wore, or the color of the hair and beard, I am not able to describe, for, in fact, no one who saw it could ever remember any of these particulars. What they did see, and could never forget, was the face of a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief cast off by those whom he loved; despised, poor, and rejected; yet with a wondrous glad lightsomeness in every line, as of one who had come to do the perfect will of God. The lips were parted in a half-smile; the eyes were wonderful—full of light, too pure to behold iniquity, searching to the very ground of the heart, tender with infinite tenderness.

Camillo could not stand before those eyes; he cast himself on his face upon the floor, weeping bitterly, and thus he lay when the devil came to claim him. But the painter knew not even that the fated hour had struck; he heard nothing of the clamor raised by the fiend, who saw that his prey had escaped him.

When at last, too blind with weeping even to read the hour upon his horologe, the artist rose to his feet, there on the floor lay the hellish contract, signed with his own blood, and he knew himself delivered.

For an hour he was in an ecstasy; then he bethought him of his custom, upon the completion of each picture, of giving a supper to his artist friends, reading their envy in their faces, and receiving their congratulations. On this occasion there could be no wild orgies such as had been known to occur at other times; but a sober and decorous banquet?—Camillo could see no reason against it. The picture was surely the best he had ever painted.

The guests were curious and amused at their host's altered mood, but followed his lead with well-bred readiness until the cloth had been removed and wine set on the table. Then Camillo arose and took away the veil from the Face of Christ.

There was, for a moment, a wondrous silence.

Then, with a great cry, a woman painted and decked with jewels, the gifts of many lovers, a woman who had sat beside the host and been sorely vexed—or professed to be—by the decorum of the feast—this woman sprang to her feet, and, with blanched face and wild white arms beating the air, fought her way blindly towards the door.

"Let me go," she cried, "ere it slay me! Let me away before his eyes burn me to ashes!"

Another guest, a young man with the wine-cup at his very lips, flung aside the ruby poison, fell on his knees, and sobbed; others fainted; one drew even his sword upon the artist, calling him a devil who could so torment them; one by one all departed from the banquet hall, and Camillo was left alone.

He was very pale, and his hand trembled as he again let fall the veil over the Face of Christ.

With the earliest dawn of the next day, Camillo was on horseback and away to visit Padre Antonio, for he did not on this occasion send for the father to come to him.

Arrived at the priest's house, he made a general confession of all his sins that he could remember.

"You cannot doubt, my father, that I am sincerely penitent," said the artist; "is there any compulsion upon me to make this confession?"

"None," said Padre Antonio; "none, unless it be the Face of Christ."

"Aye!" returned Camillo, "I am a free agent; and as such, in gratitude to the God who has broken my bargain with Satan, I vow henceforth to forsake my ill ways and evil companions, and to live righteously from this day forward."

"The Lord give thee grace so to do!" said Father Antonio.

"But at the same time, my father," pursued the painter, "you must admit that there are some excuses for me. I inherited evil tendencies; I was badly brought up; my friends have betrayed me, mine own wife was false to me, and my children are rebellious and undutiful."

"That is most true," said Padre Antonio.

"But I forgive them, 'I forgive them all freely," said Camillo. "I cannot, of course, take them back to my heart and home, for they are undeserving; but I have no hard thoughts of them, father."

"I trust not, my son, Camillo," replied the father.

"And in truth, though I am a grievous sinner, other men have done worse," continued the artist. "See what I have made of myself. You remember me when I was a ragged little artist's model; look at me now! And I have never—though under a compact with Satan—committed aught that men call crime. I have lived a life of pleasure, but have I harmed any man?"

"Thou shouldst know," said the holy man.

"I do know," returned Camillo. "Well, give me my penance, absolution, and thy blessing, father, and let me return home with a clean heart and a quiet conscience."

"There is a veil upon the face of thy picture?" asked the father.

The artist assented, with a troubled glance.

"Then be thy penance this," said Father Antonio; "to place the picture in the room of thine house thou dost most frequent, and to remove the veil. And when those eyes have read so deeply in thine heart that thou seest thyself as they see thee, then come hither—if thou wilt—for absolution and the blessing of peace. Now God be with thee; farewell."

Camillo went his way homeward with a heavy heart.

"And but now I was so happy and so blest," quoth he to himself. "Was it well done of the father to disturb my peace?" he asked. Yet did he not neglect to perform his penance.

A week later he sought the priest once more.

"My father," said he, "I am a far worse man than I dreamed. How dared I ask for absolution? For when I had hung in my studio the picture you wot of, lo! I looked around the walls, and—ask me not, I cannot tell thee. Alas that I should have wrought evil to so many souls! Think you that I can ever atone?"

"Thou shouldst know," said the priest. "Return, and look once more on the Face of Christ."

So Camillo returned.

And the next day he rose early and went his way to the house of that woman who had risen up and fled from the face of his picture.

"Thou and I," said the artist, "have done much evil together; shall we now do much good?"

And the woman agreed. So she sold her jewels and her fine raiment and what precious things she had, and Camillo did the like; and they found other women known to them both, and gathered them into one house, and persuaded them to live a godly and virtuous life. Then Camillo went away to his own house, expecting to look without fear into the Face of Christ. For, indeed, there was nothing frightful there, but looks of tender love and eyes of searching purity.

But the next morning he went to the chief picture-dealer in the city, and ordered him to go here and there and buy up again every inch of canvas which bore the name of Camillo. Now Camillo was, as has been said, a great painter, and the surface of his pictures might have been covered with gold coins without reaching their price; so when this had been done there was left of all his fortune only a tiny cottage, into which he moved with his one sole treasure, the only relic of his great fame—the Face of Christ. For all those evil and lewd pictures had been burned with fire.

“Now do I indeed repent; now may I be absolved,” quoth Camillo; and with a happy and peaceful heart he went his way to the home of Padre Antonio.

“God give you peace, my son; you have done well,” said the priest. “Thou hast a poor home but a wealthy heart; where is she who should be partner of both?”

“My wife?” cried Camillo, springing to his feet; “why, Padre, thou knowest she was false to me!”

“And thou?” said Father Antonio.

Camillo went his way back to the city. “It was ill done of the padre to disturb my peace,” he said. “Alas! I was just now so happy!”

But he did not forget his penance, and the next day he sought the father again.

“Father Antonio,” he said, “thou hast been faithful to my poor soul. Help me to find my wife.”

So the priest aided him gladly, and they found the wife of Camillo, sunk in such misery and degradation that for many days she escaped their search.

“But should I not forgive her, who have been myself forgiven?” said the artist, tenderly; and he took her home, and pleaded with her to live a better life, and dealt kindly with her.

And the Face of Christ hung on the wall unveiled.

Then, after a day or two, came Camillo again to the priest, and there were tears in his eyes.

“Father Antonio,” he said, “the Lord has shown me myself. I have been a bad son to old Marietta, my grandmother, a bad husband to my wife, a bad father to my children. My sins caused their error; the poison of my life corrupted them. Help me to atone."

So Father Antonio helped him, and they sought out old Marietta, whom he had neglected many years, and Camillo's sons and daughters; and before them all the artist humbled himself, and they fell upon his neck with tears, and forgave and were forgiven. Only Marietta, who had forgotten by this time the sins of his boyhood, and remembered only his glory and great name, maintained that she had nothing to forgive.

So Camillo took her home, and his children dwelt near by in houses of their own, and all were happy and at peace among themselves. And the Face of Christ shone down upon them from the wall. But they had few friends in the city who cared to enter their humble dwelling; for it was a fearful thing carelessly to meet those pictured eyes.

Now, when they had so dwelt for many days, Camillo came again to Father Antonio, and said, "Father, may I yet be absolved?"

But Padre Antonio did not answer.

"What!" cried the painter, "is there yet more to do?"

"Thou shouldst know," said Father Antonio.

"I know not," said Camillo, sorrowfully. "I have done all that can be done; even the slightest tie of friendship that hath bound my soul in former days have I sought to reunite; and if the friend had been wronged, I have besought forgiveness."

"Hath it been always granted?" asked the priest.

"Nay," said Camillo, "for to some the wrong hath been that my poison hath so tainted their souls that they have wronged me; and that wrong is hard to pardon. But the others have forgiven."

"It is well," said Padre Antonio.

"Yet you tell me there is more," said the artist.

"I tell thee? nay," said the priest. "Thou shouldst know. What does the Face of Christ tell thee? My son, when thou hast won his absolution thou wilt not ask mine."

Then Camillo went home very sorrowful, and yet happy, for he felt that he could now look calmly and fearlessly into the eyes of the Christ: yet also he would have liked well the priest's absolution.

So when night had fallen and he was left alone with his masterpiece, he knelt down before his canvas, and, folding his hands like the hands of a little child at prayer, he looked upward into the pictured eyes.

And the Face of Christ shone down upon his soul. The eyes were very searching, yet, oh! so loving and tender; the parted lips seemed to smile like the lips of a mother over her naughty child as she says, "But, darling, you grieve mamma."

Then Camillo fell upon his face with a great cry.

And in the morning he went back to Father Antonio.

"Ah, my father! how dared I ask for absolution? I, who knew not the smallest fraction of my sin! What are all my offenses against my fellow-man to my sins against Him?"

"Ah! what indeed!" said Padre Antonio.

"I allied myself with His foes, I rejected His love, I cast Him out of my heart, I caused those to sin for whom He died."

"And I also," said Padre Antonio.

"And yet He forgives; He has always forgiven; that crushes me," said Camillo. "There is no effort in it with Him—He forgives freely. There is no little by little in it; I have come back to Him step by step, but He has carried me always in His heart. Padre Antonio, what shall I do to be saved?"

"Go back," said the priest, "and look once more on the Face of Christ."

So Camillo went back, and knelt all night long before his masterpiece, and the eyes of the Christ shone down into his soul. And a great sorrow came upon him, and also a great joy; a great anguish and a great peace; because the love without him was greater than the love within, and for the first moment in his half-century of years he felt all its weight.

Therefore, between the joy and the anguish, his heart broke, and his soul was drawn up into the ocean of love, eternal and illimitable.

And in the morning they found him lying dead beneath the eyes of Christ, with the peace of heaven upon his pallid features.

"The Lord Christ hath absolved him," said Padre Antonio.

TRUE SOCIALISM

From 'Metzerott, Shoemaker.' Copyright, James Y. Crowell and Company, and used here by permission.

. . . WITH the Sangerfest itself we had nothing to do. Of course there were processions, concerts, balls, and all the rest of the routine with which Americans have since become so familiar; but the only noticeable incident for us is that when, as their contribution to the prize singing, the Micklegard Männerchor gave that sweetest of German Volkslieder, "Bei'm Liebchen zu Haus," the audience arose as one man and applauded to the very echo. The prize was theirs; a result to which, in Dora's opinion, Karl's rich bass had not a little contributed.

She was thinking briefly of this and other matters, in the train that bore her homewards, when her attention was attracted to a conversation going on between two young men who occupied the seat before her. They were students of the Laketon University, though this Dora could not be expected to know; and as one was Irish and the other a German, even more prone than is the case with students in general to discuss all things in heaven above, the earth beneath, and the waters under the earth. They spoke in English or German as suited their subject-matter or the impulse of the moment, and the first words that caught Dora's attention were these:—

"Have I ever objected to Socialism in itself?"

"What do you call its Self? You seem to object to its most necessary elements."

"By no means. I only say that you Socialists are short-sighted, and seem to adopt the very measures best calculated to defeat your own ends."

"Specify, specify!" growled the German.

"With pleasure. The end at which you profess to aim is a universal brotherhood among men, a sort of lion and lamb lying down together all over the world; yet you go to work, with your secret plots and your assassinations, as if you were preparing for another Reign of Terror."

"The Reign of Terror may be necessary beforehand."

"Very long beforehand, then. You know the story of the tiger who has once tasted blood. Teaching men to murder makes them murderers; no less. You can't build your social republic out of unsocial Republicans, dear boy."

"Oh! get along with your Irish sophistry! A social republic, as you call it, seems to be, in your eyes, another Donnybrook Fair!"

"Take your time," said the Irishman. "When a fellow falls back on old Donnybrook, I know he's hard pressed for an argument."

"I could prove to you in five minutes that tyrannicide is not murder, any more than tiger-hunting; and"—warned by a twinkle in the blue Irish eye—"far more righteous than ordinary capital punishment. But, passing that over for the time, I should like to know what means you would employ to build a social republic, supposing you wanted one?"

"Do you suppose I should not hail the advent of true Socialism as the dawn of new light and life for the world?"

"Eh? a new convert! But stop! there was a qualifying word. True Socialism; that is, with all its distinctive features omitted."

"Not at all. Socialism with all its vital organs strengthened and purified; in short—Christianity."

"I thought so! Christianity! Why, Christianity has had her fling for eighteen centuries, and what has she done?"

"The first thing she did was to establish a commune," replied the Irishman. "You can read a full account of it in the Book of Acts, including the history of some weak disciples, who, having perhaps been trained in tiger-hunting, were not fully equal to the occasion during a reign of peace. As the first recorded experiment in Socialism, it ought to interest you."

"But the experiment failed."

"Failed? In the reign of Tiberius, with Nero and Caligula and all those fellows to come after? Well, rather! The world wasn't quite ready for it, not by some eighteen centuries, so Christianity fell back on her intrenchments, as you might say, and, while she reserved the spirit of Socialism, let go the letter."

She did, did she? why, Christians—"

"I'm not talking about Christians. We're a bad lot, most of us, but it's because we don't live up to our principles. You read over your Gospels, old boy, and tell me whether, if they really and vitally influenced the lives of the majority of Americans, Socialism in its essence—that is, Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity—would not follow as a matter of course.”

“Oh! perhaps, yes. I don’t quarrel with your religion as a system of morality, Clare. It is”—

“I know; miracles. But how a fellow who, not content with making bricks without straw, tries to build a house by tearing up the foundations, can quarrel with miracles, passes my comprehension. Look here. Do you not know that this is a waste of time to reform society from the outside, and especially by main force? The worm at the root of the social tree, my dear fellow, is sin. How do you propose to get rid of it?”

“Ah, there indeed,” sighed the German, his metaphysical soul rising to the bait, “you start the great religious problem, my friend, with which Zoroaster, Buddha, and other religious teachers have grappled.”

“And which only Christ has solved,” said Ernest Clare.

Whereupon they rushed into a discussion which, taking by and by another turn, led them into transcendental mathematics, and the possible existence of worlds or universes where a fourth dimension forms part of the usual order of things; with many wild fancies as to the type of inhabitants such universes may possess. When Karl hurried back from the other end of the car to fetch his wife and change cars for Mickle-gard, they were still hard at it.

That night Dora had a singular dream. She stood in a world which formed part of one of those universes of which Clare and his companion had spoken; a universe which admits a fourth, even perhaps a fifth, dimension, and which must therefore differ so widely from our earth even in the primary elements that compose what here we call land and water, that any attempt to describe it were but as the meaningless babble of an infant.

In the world whereon she stood or floated—for our commonplace to them would be miraculous, while what we call miracle is there a daily happening—there was a stir and moving to and fro, as of leaves swayed by a sudden breeze. One of their number had willed to leave them, and seeking our earth—known to him as the theatre of the wondrous drama of redemption—to don our uniform of flesh and strike one good blow against sin. And this, by a law of his world, was possible to him.

He stood, a tall, radiant figure, before One appointed to hear such requests and decide upon them.

"Have you thought well upon the matter?" it was asked him. "It is nothing that, though you may choose to go or stay, you may by no means choose your post in the battle. No good soldier would grumble at that; nor, to say truth, is the difference between what there they call riches and poverty, high and low, happiness and misery, at all worth considering. But have you thought upon the horribleness, the awful, slimy infectiousness, of the foe you must close with in a death grapple? Have you considered the sinfulness of sin?"

"I have looked upward to the midnight sky," he made answer, "and have beheld the universe that contains earth floating there, a pale, translucent disk. And when the thought of sin had stained its purity with the hue of blood, I have been as one who, bound and helpless, beholds a fiery serpent approaching, to devour before his eyes a sleeping, innocent babe."

"But what," it was urged, "if you should be overcome in the struggle? For the serpent is very strong, and his poison is death."

"The Life of our King," he replied, "is stronger than the death of the serpent."

"But the choice is forever," he was told. "Victor or vanquished, hither you can never return, save as others have done, in passing from world to world. Man you will be, and man you must remain forever. Also, you will forget your world, your friends; and, though broken visions may float about your infancy, like rainbow hues above the dewdrops of morning, they will vanish all too soon before the coming of that sun of earth."

"Morning and evening are alike His handiwork," he replied. "Everywhere and always I shall have Him."

Then He who had questioned him arose solemnly. "Thou bearest with thee the sign of victory," He said. "Go in peace."

And it seemed to Dora as if the tall, radiant form turned upon her, her alone in all that illimitable throng, a face of wondrous and eternal beauty. Close it came, and closer still; now they were two alone in all that measureless universe, and his lips smiled, and the eyes were the eyes of a little child.

"Mother!" he said, and kissed her on the lips; wherewith a strange shuddering thrill of utter bliss shot through every member. She woke to find the daylight streaming in at the curtainless window. Her heart was throbbing heavily, her limbs trembled, and her eyes were full of tears.

THE RIVER BRUAPO

From 'The True Story of Captain John Smith.'

. . . THIS was the river Bruapo, which has always been a puzzle to historians.

His journey, he tells us, was by land as far as Varna, on the Black Sea; there he took ship and so reached the strait of Kertch, and passed through the Sea of Azov, to the mouth of the river Bruapo, "which springeth from many places of the mountains Innagachi that join themselves together in the pool Kerkas." This pool, he says, the people of that country account for the head of the river; we shall see presently how he came by his better information. The river empties into the "Sea Dissabacca, called by some the Lake Meotis, which receiveth also the river Tanais," or Don.

Now, there is no single river in those parts that answers absolutely to this description; and Smith having with him no chart of the country—as indeed such scarcely existed—was unable to ascertain his exact locality. But there is very little doubt that as a matter of fact he entered one of the mouths of the Don, probably the most southerly, and that after a short sail up that river he turned aside into the Manitsch or Manytch. This river, which empties into the Don from the east, widens at one point into the Lake Manitschkoie, which may readily have been the pool Kerkas, as it is situated in the country of the "Circassi;" it is not, however, the head of the river, which is formed by various tributaries having their sources in or near the Caucasus range; there are in particular three streams, each called the Gegelik, which unite with the Manitsch, just above the pools. And even such an acute topographer as Smith may be excused for failing to perceive the transition from river to river, since the junction is masked by one of the innumerable islets formed by the Don and its confluent streams, which bring down from the inland by the violence of their inundations great quantities of soil, as Captain Smith is careful to explain.

Cambia, which was six or seven days' sail up the Bruapo or Manitsch, was at a point where the river was more than half a mile wide; the castle of that name was of large circumference with walls fourteen or fifteen feet thick; "in the foundation, some six feet from the wall, is a palizado, and then a ditch of about forty feet wide full of water. On the west is a town, all of low, flat houses; which as he conceives could be of no great strength, yet it keeps all them barbarous countries about it in admiration and subjection."

A TWILIGHT FANTASIA

Copyright, Dodd, Mead and Company, and used here by permission of the author and the publishers.

Through sunlit hours, a goblin grey
Deep in the mine I toil,
But when evening burns, and the west is red,
I quit my golden spoil—
Then gayly alight is my firefly lamp,
Aloft and aloft it gleams,
White, 'gainst the sunset's dying glow,
Gold, where the young moon streams,
As I flit and flash on my fairy wings,
Through the shadow of flower and tree,
Seeking thee.

Under the king-fern's feathery frond,
I peer as I swiftly pass,
Where the tall, proud pine doth pierce the sky,
'Neath the blade of the dew-bent grass,
Somewhere, somewhen, I shall see thee stand,
Dainty, and small and white,

With thy rainbow gems, and thy mist white hair,
And thine eyes of elfin light;
My firefly lamp thou shalt smile to see,
Seeking thee.

Is it the gleam of her fairy robe,
Half-hid by the leaves of the clover?
I flash to the meadow, I rise, I fall,
I pause for an instant over—
Away! 'tis the white of the clover bloom,
Tender and small and sweet,
The dew-drops' sparkle that gems the grass,
Not the touch of her elfin feet—
Away! on my endless quest I flee,
Seeking thee.

But the hour will come that shall give me back
Sheen of robe from a fairy loom,
When the moonlight shines where the west is grey—
Or the dark pine's barren gloom
Shall answer the flash of my firefly lamp
With the light of thy longing eyes, . . .
Then my light shall fade and my wings shall fold
When the goblin hath found his prize,
No more to flutter from tree to tree,
Seeking thee.

So, better, perchance, is the wild free flight,
Of a joyous, endless quest,
Than the hush of a heart that hath not to seek,
But hath found its first and best.
By day and by night a goblin grey,
Heaping the golden spoil?—
Nay, gayly alight is my firefly lamp,
For past is my day of toil;
And, white where the sunset has died away,
Gold, where the moonlight streams,
It flits, it flashes, where shadows move,
In the long lush grass it gleams,
Then, love, through the twilight fleeteth free,
Seeking thee.

HOLD ME NOT FALSE

Copyright, Dodd, Mead and Company, and used here by permission of the author and the publishers.

Love is not love,
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove.

Hold me not false, O friend! The year is young,
The streams are breaking bounds, the throbbing sap
Swells in the purpling branches of the trees,
And furry leaf-buds fringe the softening boughs;
While, down amid the leaves of lost last year,
Sweet spring has won a rosy blossoming.

Change is not always death: hold me not false,
Believe in me a little while, O friend!

Hold me not false! See how the affluent earth
Opens her bare brown bosom to the plough;
Seed-death brings harvest resurrection. Ah!
Hot-hearted earth, wherefore thy flaming wrath?
Wherefore the heaving sea, offenceless torn,
Or fiery vapors blown o'er smiling skies?
. . . Behold! another island!

Earth hath changed;
Believe in me a little while, O friend!

Believe in me! On all the autumn woods,
And on the fields by mower's scythe left bare,
Gleameth a glory monarch never knew.
The barns are full, and Mother Earth, bereft,
Gloweth in her festal raiment. Royal robes
To deck a mourner? But the barns are full!

Change is not always death; hold me not false,
Believe in me a little while, O friend.

Wilt thou believe at last, when winter spreads
His ermine mantle o'er the frozen fields;
When all the birds are dumb, and winds are chill,
And bare black branches sharply cut grey sky?

Ah, see! The crimson of the waiting west
Glows later every evening; spring will come!
Silence, desertion, death, shall not be truth;
Believe in me a little while, O friend!

ONE POET TO ANOTHER

From Harper's Magazine, December, 1891, and used here by permission of the author and the publishers.

(Accompanying a manuscript sonnet—with emendations.)

My True-love's lute I love to tune aright,
So truly doth he sing of truest love;
His lightsome lay makes night's cold shadows bright,
When his clear lute is truly tuned aright,
Each note glows golden to the ravished sight,
Each soul of man doth with that music move—
When his true lute my True-love tunes aright,
And sings, to heaven and me, of deathless love.

His lightsome lay makes night's cold shadows bright;
For, at his singing, see! my sun doth rise.
Then all my life is radiant in men's sight,
My earth out-heavens Heaven's own golden light.
As night grows day, so day is dimmed to night,
By the true measure that my True-love tries.
His lightsome lay makes night's cold shadows bright;
For, at his singing, see! my sun doth rise.

Now, since my life is radiant in men's eyes,
My True-love's lute I seek to tune aright;
And all my flow'rs gathered 'neath twilight skies,
Ere, to his music, my life's sun did rise,
I twine about, to please the world's cold eyes,
His lovesome lute. Ah! fragrant flowers and bright,
For me he sings! Therefore, my sun doth rise,
Whether or no his lute be tuned aright.

JOHN ALLAN WYETH

[1845—]

MARION J. VERDERY

JOHN ALLAN WYETH, M.D., LL.D., of the University of Louisville (1869); ad eundem Bellevue Hospital Medical College (1873); University of Alabama (1901), and University of Maryland (1909), is the fourth and youngest child, the second and only surviving son of Louis Weiss Wyeth and Euphemia Allan, and was born at Missionary Station, Marshall County, Alabama, May 26, 1845.

As to his paternal ancestry he traces his descent to Nicholas Wyeth (or Wythe) who came from England in 1630 and settled in Massachusetts. Another brother settling in Virginia established the family of which George Wythe, counsellor and statesman, was the last and most distinguished member.

Louis Weiss Wyeth (father of John Allan) was born in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, June 20, 1812, and died in Marshall County, Alabama, July 7, 1889. He was educated at the Male Academy of which his father was one of the founders, later president and the controlling spirit. Possessing intellect of a high order, and wisely appreciative of the value of learning, he applied himself assiduously to his academic work and reaped the full advantage of the best opportunities of his youthful days for a classical education. At eighteen he attended the Law School at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, was graduated at twenty-one, and was admitted to the Bar, settling in Harrisburg for three years. In 1836 he settled in Marshall County, Alabama, and was soon thereafter made Judge of the Probate Court and later represented his county in the Legislature. He was twice elected Judge of the Fifth Judicial District, declined reelection and also declined the Chief Justiceship of the Supreme Court of Alabama. His rule of practice was never to plead a cause unless he was convinced that it was just. His religious convictions (Presbyterian) were strong and lasting. In the Civil War his opinions and sympathies were on the Southern side, and, although beyond the age of conscription, he enlisted and went to the front. He was later discharged on account of illness and resulting physical disability. After a long and useful life, "without fear and without reproach," he died July 7, 1889.

Euphemia Allan, daughter of Reverend John Allan and Nancy Hodge, was born in Gallatin, Tennessee, June 17, 1817, and died in Guntersville, Alabama, December 27, 1896. Her paternal grandfather was David Allan, of Ayr, Scotland. Her father was born in Hertford, England, April 21, 1788, emigrated to Georgia in 1801, and was graduated from the University of Georgia at Athens in 1807. A man of great learning and piety, he became a Presbyterian minister, married Nancy Hodge, July 20, 1809, and died in Huntsville, Alabama, November 14, 1843.

The father of Nancy was Joseph Hodge, who, born in England in 1755, emigrated to North Carolina, served under General Greene in the Revolutionary War, and was severely wounded at the Battle of Guilford Court House. Receiving a grant of land in Sumner County, Tennessee, he settled there and died February 28, 1822.

Euphemia Allan, reared and educated in a family and a community noted for culture and refinement, dedicated her life with unselfish devotion to her children and their father, and, beyond these, to others who most needed help. On one of her many errands of mercy to a sick ex-Confederate soldier, she received an injury which rendered her entirely unable to walk or stand; and for fifteen years before her death she was helplessly confined to a wheel-chair or to her bed. With sublime courage and uncomplaining fortitude she submitted to this dispensation of Providence and lived and died the Spartan mother.

John Allan Wyeth was educated at the common school in Guntersville until 1861, when he became a cadet at LaGrange Military Academy (LaGrange College) in Franklin County, Alabama. Here he remained for one year, when this college was closed on account of the Civil War.

On June 7, 1862, he took part in an engagement at Law's Landing on the Tennessee River, with a detachment of the Tenth Ohio Infantry.

As a volunteer in Quirk's Scouts of General John H. Morgan's cavalry, he served with this command in the winter of 1862-63, and in the expedition known as the "Christmas Raid" was in the engagements at Bear Wallow, near Glasgow, on December twenty-fifth; at Upton Station, December twenty-sixth; Elizabethtown, December twenty-seventh; Mudraugh's Hill on the twenty-eighth, and on the next day at Rolling Fork River (where General Basil Duke was desperately wounded and was carried off the field by Captain Quirk.)

From April, 1863, to the close of the war, in 1865, he served in Company I, Russell's Fourth Alabama Cavalry Regiment, of Wheeler's and Forrest's corps. On the retreat of Bragg's army to Chattanooga, he took part in the engagement at Shelbyville, June 27, 1863; in two engagements at Morris Ford on Elk River on July second, and also at Winchester, Tennessee.

On the night of September 14, 1863, on account of duty deemed extraordinarily hazardous, for which he volunteered and which involved passing through the right wing of the Federal Army as a bearer of dispatches, he was granted an "unlimited leave of absence," which was declined. He was in the three days' Battle of Chickamauga on the eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth of September, 1863, and on the twenty-first took part in the defeat of the Union Cavalry in McLemore's Cove. He took part in the fighting at the crossing of the Tennessee at Cottonport, September thirtieth, and on October 2, 1863, at Anderson's Cross Roads in Sequatchie Valley, his regiment, unaided, rode over and took as prisoners the entire guard and captured and destroyed probably the largest supply train taken during the war. This wagon-train stretched along the road a distance of eight miles. Having lost his horse in this engagement, he was cut off from the main column by McCook's Union Cavalry and taken prisoner.

Of the sixteen months as a prisoner of war, fifteen were spent in confinement in Camp Morton, Indiana. A sketch of the treatment to which Confederate soldiers were subjected, written by him and entitled, "Cold Cheer in Camp Morton," was published in the Century Magazine for April, 1891.

Exchanged in April, 1865, he returned to service and was present at the capture of Macon, Georgia, by General James H. Wilson, when he was surrendered with the garrison, but subsequently escaped.

At the close of hostilities in 1865 and in 1866 he engaged in farming; in 1867 began the study of medicine and was graduated in April, 1869, from the University of Louisville. After two months of practice at Guntersville, Alabama, in June, 1869, he became surgeon to a railroad construction company operating in the White River section of Arkansas. After one year he temporarily abandoned practice and for two years was engaged in steamboating and in the construction of public works.

In October, 1872, he resumed his professional studies in New York City, receiving the degree ad eundem in March, 1873; in April he was appointed Assistant Demonstrator and in the following year Prosecutor to the Chair of Anatomy in Bellevue Hospital Medical College.

In 1880 he was appointed Visiting Surgeon at Mount Sinai Hospital and Consulting Surgeon at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, New York City. In 1881 he became senior professor of surgery in, and later, president of, the Faculty of the New York Polyclinic Medical School and Hospital, which institution introduced post-graduate medical instruction in the United States. In 1885, and again in 1886, he was elected president of the New York Pathological Society, and in 1893 first vice-president of the American Medical Association. In 1900 he was elected president of the New York State Medical Association; in 1901 president of the American Medical Association, and in the same year the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred upon him by the University of Alabama. In January, 1907, he was elected president of the New York Academy of Medicine and was re-elected in 1909. In May, 1909, the University of Maryland conferred upon him the honorary degree of LL.D.

He was married April 10, 1886, to Florence Nightingale Sims, daughter of the eminent surgeon, J. Marion Sims. By this union there are three children, one daughter and two sons, Florence Wyeth, born January 26, 1887; Marion Sims Wyeth, born February 18, 1889, and John Allan Wyeth, Jr., born October 24, 1894.

He is the author of a "Hand-book of Medical and Surgical Reference" (1875); an essay on "Dextral Preference in Man" (1875); a "Monograph on Minor Surgery" (1876). In this same year he was awarded the Bellevue Medical College Alumni Association Prize for "the best essay on any subject connected with surgery or surgical pathology," his subject being "Amputation at the Ankle-Joint." In 1878 he was awarded the first prize of the American Medical Association for an essay on "The Surgical Anatomy and Surgery of the Carotid Arteries," and received the second prize of the same association (1878) for an essay on the "Surgical Anatomy and Surgery of the Innominate and Subclavian Arteries." At this time he published an essay on the "Obturator Arteries and the Importance of their Relation to Hernia," and later a pamphlet on "Suprapubic Cystotomy, with a Report of Sixty Cases"; an "Osteoplastic Operation for the Correction of Deformities of the Alveolar Arch and for Cleft Palate and Hair-Lip"; "Removal of the Lower Jaw from Within the Mouth Without External Incision," an essay on "The Surgical Treatment of Aneurisms of the Arch of the Aorta, Innominate, Subclavian, and Carotid Arteries by the Distal Ligature," and "Some Original Researches on the Occlusion of Arteries by Cell Proliferation." In 1890 he made public his method of "Bloodless Amputation at the Shoulder and Hip Joints"; and in 1903 "A New Method of Treating Inoperable Vascular Tumors by the Injection into their Substance of Water at a High Temperature."

In 1895 he delivered an oration on "J. Marion Sims and His Work," before the Southern Surgical and Gynecological Association at Washington, and an address on "Medical Education" before the Mississippi Valley Association at Louisville in 1890. In 1886 he published the first edition of his "Text-Book on Surgery," which in 1909 has passed through four separate editions. In 1901, at St. Paul, he delivered the "Oration on Surgery" before the American Medical Association, and the "President's Address" before the same Association at Saratoga in 1902.

Among his contributions to other than professional literature are: An article in the Century Magazine for April, 1891, entitled, "Cold Cheer in Camp Morton," a narrative of prison life from October, 1863, to February, 1865; a historical sketch in Harper's Magazine, November, 1892, entitled, "Nathaniel J. Wyeth and the Struggle for Oregon." In Harper's Weekly, 1898, "General Wheeler's Leap," a sketch of the Battle of Shelbyville, June 27, 1863; a series of articles on "General N. B. Forrest at Fort Donelson"; "The Capture of Colonel A. D. Straight and his Entire Command"; "The Storming of Fort Pillow"; "Forrest at Brice's Cross-Roads," all in Harper's Magazine, 1899. In the Confederate Veteran for November, 1900, appeared the "Narrative of a Scouting Expedition in 1863." In 1899 his "Life of General Nathan Bedford Forrest" was published by Harper and Brothers, a second edition being issued in 1908.

To the foregoing record of his ancestry and achievements there remains to be added only a brief appreciation of his personality.

His bearing is so exceedingly modest that a stranger would never suspect his distinction. His sterling manhood combines with an exquisite gentleness of nature to make him kind, considerate, and generous. His heart is true to the impulses of sympathy and tenderness, his nerve is equal to the demands of highest courage, and his mind reflects the beauty of culture and the power of truth. His uncompromising integrity and exalted sense of honor harmonize well with the exactness of his science and the nobility of his profession. His character, as a whole, bespeaks the superiority of his lineage, and his brilliant achievements testify not only to his genius, but to the inestimable value of his conscientious labors for the relief of human suffering. High-minded, pure-hearted, and gentle-tempered, he commands confidence, inspires admiration, and compels love.

Marion J. Gentry

TO A SOUTHERN BELLE MARRIED TO A FRENCH
NOBLEMAN

Beneath the sky
Where you and I
Were born; where beauty grows,
Up from the sod
At touch of God
There sprang a stately rose.

It grew, and men in wonderment
Beheld the beauteous thing—
Alas! for Hope which wooing went,
And Love which sorrowing,
Learns that the flower it loves the best,
The one it guards the tenderest,
The hand of Fate transplants!
Our Southern rose
Now sweetly grows
'Among the hills of France.

Go search the gardens of Vendée
Which poets long have sung—
Go cull the flowers that blush the hills
Of Picardie among.
Land of romance!
Fair land of France!

With all your glorious flowers,
Lilies of old
And cloth of gold,
We needs must lend you ours!
Right well, I guess,
For loveliness,
For beauty in repose,
There is no lily in all France
Can match our Southern rose.

MY SWEETHEART'S FACE

My kingdom is my sweetheart's face,
And these the boundaries I trace:
Northward her forehead fair;
Beyond a wilderness of auburn hair;
A rosy cheek to east and west;
 Her little mouth,
 The sunny south,
It is the south that I love best.

Her eyes, two crystal lakes,
 Rippling with light,
Caught from the sun by day,
 The stars by night.
 The dimples in
 Her cheeks and chin
Are snares which Love hath set,
 And I have fallen in!

TO A COQUETTE

Fair maid, thou art not fair, which paradox
Is truth although a seeming contradiction.
And since the truth, alas! thy sex most shocks,
I may accuse thee by rehearsing fiction.
The story's old. 'Tis of a jar or box
Which, under threat of lasting malediction
To all mankind, the gods had closed the lid.
All caskets else it was allowed to ope,
But, being woman, that which was forbid
Was just exactly what Pandora did.
The story's told. The keyless lock was raped
And all of evil that therein was hid,
Sorrow and Woe, Death and Despair escaped.
Frightened, she slammed the lid and shut in Hope
But thou, more cruel, fair and yet not fair,
Let Hope escape and left for me Despair.

TO MY MOTHER

Deal gently with her, Time! these many years
Of life have brought more smiles with them than tears.
Lay not thy hand too harshly on her now,
But trace decline so slowly on her brow
That (like a sunset of the northern clime,
Where twilight lingers in the summer time,
And fades at last into the silent night,
Ere one may note the passing of the light)
So may she pass—since 'tis the common lot—
As one who, resting, sleeps, and knows it not.

AN EXHORTATION TO THE DOCTOR

From an Address to the Graduating Classes of the University of Maryland,
May 31, 1909.

As to your future, success or failure rests almost wholly with you. Barring the rare disasters which are beyond human foresight and control, each of you possessing the intelligence and application necessary to win the diploma awarded you, can achieve a successful career. The one great essential is the clean and manly life, the life of sobriety and self-control. No matter how gifted or how rich in attainment and opportunity, you can not reap the full measure of usefulness and success, if you descend to vicious associations.

The physician should be as clean morally as in person and attire. The man who cannot control a desire for stimulants should not and can not in conscience accept the awful responsibility of the lives and happiness of others.

While the use of tobacco from my point of view is unnecessary and deplorable, under ordinary conditions its effect is not to dull the sense of responsibility or impair professional judgment and skill. The habit is, however, a confession of weakness which it were well to forego.

Success in medicine, as in all other avocations, demands a consecration to duty—"the sublimest word in the English language." You must not only know your business thoroughly but you must make every possible sacrifice to attend to it. Dissipation and distractions of all sorts which steal the time and divert the mind from the one chief interest, are stumbling-blocks in the path which leads to the high places.

When not at work in private or public practice, be in the nearest and best library or laboratory. Be where you may be found and where you will be sought after when it is known that you are habitually there.

Be not only a worker but a thinker. I approve the skeptic in medicine. Make it a rule not to accept the dictum or the conclusion of another unless after careful consideration or trial you are convinced of its truth. The mind which questions and investigates is the one which is apt to contribute something of value to the betterment of mankind.

In all the relations to your patients and to your brothers in the profession, try to do in every emergency just what you would have done for yourself, or for some one near and dear to you. Put yourself in his place.

A TRIBUTE TO J. MARION SIMS

From an Address on 'Dr. J. Marion Sims and His Work,' 1895.

IN 1894, a year ago, there was unveiled in Bryant Park, New York City, a statue in bronze of this immortal man. It stands erect and proud, a life-like image of the great teacher, the spontaneous gift from his brothers in the profession throughout the civilized world, and from many of the unfortunate beings his genius and skill had benefited. In brief yet comprehensive phraseology, the inscription tells the story of his career:

J. MARION SIMS, M.D., LL.D.

Born in South Carolina, 1813. Died in New York City in 1883.

Surgeon and Philanthropist.

Founder of the Woman's Hospital of the State of New York.

His Brilliant Achievements Carried the Fame of American Surgery

Throughout the Civilized World.

In Recognition of his Services in the Cause of Science and Mankind.

He Received the Highest Honors in the Gift of his Countrymen
And Decorations from the Governments of France, Portugal, Spain, Belgium, and Italy.

On the reverse:

Presented
To the City of New York by
His Professional Friends, Loving Patients,
and Many Admirers
Throughout the World.

Marion Sims possessed a striking personality. With all his long and bitter struggle with poverty and for professional recognition, and in his early days for health and life itself, time had dealt gently with his form and face, whereon Nature had set in unmistakable lines the stamp of greatness. Although he had rounded well the years allotted by the Psalmist, his step was still quick and firm, his carriage erect, dignified, and graceful. The frosts of age had not tinged the rich abundance of his dark-brown hair, which fell straight back from off the massive forehead, for the ever-active brain and the deep-seated, searching eyes of brown, asked always for the light! The brows were arched and unusually heavy and prominent; most beautifully proportioned and of Grecian type; the mouth well shaped, lips usually compressed, which, with the prominent chin, bespoke courage and firmness of purpose. His face was oval, clean-shaven and smooth, and the usual expression was of almost womanly sweetness, yet it was quick to vary in harmony with whatever emotion was predominant. Away from excitement and in the home-life, his expression and actions were almost boyish. He never seemed to have forgotten that he was once a boy, and he would throw himself into a household frolic with all the abandon of his early days. He was courageous to a degree, and although he rarely lost control of his temper, yet he was at times imperious and aggressive. When occasion demanded he was a good fighter, and fought his enemies with right good will; but he was quick to forgive, and just before his death he said to me one day, "I have forgiven all who ever did me a wrong, with one exception." As said of him by a gifted orator, he possessed qualities ideal in the make-up of a truly great surgeon, "the brain of an Apollo, the heart of a lion, the eye of an eagle, and the hand of a woman."

If generosity be a fault, it was his besetting sin, and that was all the sin of which I deemed him capable.

Toward the higher and purer civilization, the progress of man is slow. As yet the shadows of barbarism linger about him. His heroes are the destroyers, the Cæsars and Napoleons, who covered the earth with ruin and buried beneath it countless lives, sacrificed upon the altar of personal ambition. But the time must come when those whose genius and works give life and health and happiness to the world will be first in the heart of man. In this purer temple of fame, along with those of Jenner, Ephraim McDowell, Morton, Lister, Pasteur, and others, generations yet unborn shall read the name of Marion Sims.

GENERAL FORREST'S PERSONALITY

From 'The Life of General Nathan Bedford Forrest.'

It has been suggested that certain portions of this book which bear testimony of Forrest's harshness and violent temper should not be made public, as they might detract from his reputation as a man; but it has been my endeavor to paint him exactly as he lived, so that posterity may form its own opinion of him from the evidence. To my mind it would be as inexcusable to hide any of his shortcomings as it would be to permit the assailants of his reputation to go unchallenged. He had his weaknesses, and was not an angel by any means, but he was far from being a man who did not have a high sense of right and justice. Personally, nothing would please me more than to have left out of my book everything which could possibly awaken an unpleasant memory or cause the slightest irritation, but simple justice to Forrest requires a recitation of some of these unhappy incidents.

Happily for all, the bitterness engendered by that fratricidal struggle has passed away, and while Forrest took the Southern side and fought to the last with desperate energy and an intensity of purpose unsurpassed, his history and his fame are part of the glory of our common country. No spirit more loyal to its convictions ever animated a mortal frame than that which dominated his all too brief existence. When his blood-red sword was sheathed at last, he took on the modes of peace as earnestly and consistently as he had carried on the direful methods of war. From the day that his battle-flag was furled to the day of his death he labored for more than a political rehabilitation of the nation. He wished a union heart to heart between the South and the North. This was the burden of his eloquent and pathetic addresses to the veterans of his command at the annual reunions; and when the hand of the Great Destroyer was laid upon him, in his last will he bequeathed his sword to his son with the expressed wish that, should occasion offer, he, as his father would have done, would use it under the Stars and Stripes with the same devotion and earnestness that it had been wielded for the Southern Confederacy.

THE PIONEER QUALITY

From 'The Life of General Nathan Bedford Forrest.'

Now and then there comes upon the stage of life, in the theatre of this world, a man who so differs from the rest of

The innumerable caravan that moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take His chamber in the silent halls of death that he catches the eye and ear at once, and, as long as he moves in the scene, holds the attention of his fellows. When the sable curtain falls, and his part in the drama is over, we who remain to fill the minor rôles find time in moments of reflection to ask ourselves: What manner of man was this, and wherein did he differ from others of his kind? By what mysterious alchemy did the elements in him combine to lift him to the stars, while we who just as earnestly, with upturned eyes and patient longing, strive to reach the realms of the immortals, stumble and fall, perish and are forgotten?

On the 13th day of July, in the year 1821, in a rude frontier cabin, amid surroundings which told of poverty, and in the obscurity of a remote backwoods settlement of middle Tennessee, there was born one of these rare beings. The light which first greeted his infant vision came through the cracks in the chinking between the logs of hewn cedar, or sent its penetrating rays beneath the riven boards of the roof which in overlapping rows were laid upon the rafters and held in place by heavy poles and blocks, in lieu of nails. This humble cabin, which was his mother's home, claimed no more than eighteen by twenty feet of earth to rest upon, with a single room below and a half-room or loft overhead. One end of this building was almost entirely given up to the broad fireplace, while in the middle of each side swung, on wooden hinges, a door. There was no need of a window, for light and air found ready access through the doorways and cracks, and down through the wide squatty chimney. A pane of glass was a luxury as yet unknown to this primitive life. Around and near the house was a cleared patch of land containing several acres enclosed with a straight stake-fence of cedar rails, and by short cross-fences divided into a yard immediately about the cabin; rearward of this a garden, and a young orchard of peach, apple, pear, and plum trees. The yard fence ran parallel with the public road so newly cut through the forest that stumps and roots of trees still showed above the level of the ground, waiting to be removed by the slow process of decay.

Across the highway, squatting among the giant cedars of the Duck River country, stood a log blacksmith-shop, with bellows and forge, anvil, tongs, and hammer, and the other simple paraphernalia of an artisan in iron; and here, "week in, week out, from morn till night," the sparks flew in showers from the red-hot metal as the skillful hand and powerful arm of the workman, with turning tongs and sturdy blows of the hammer, wrought the half-molten mass into useful shape.

The owner of this shop was William Forrest, blacksmith, then twenty-one years of age, more than six feet in height, with the heavy, muscular development of a mechanic. He was an honorable man and a law-abiding citizen, sober, and industrious. This I have from a perfectly reliable source—from one who lived a near neighbor and knew him well. He must have been this and more to have won the love and devotion of Miriam Beck, the woman of extraordinary character who on this day first held to a mother's breast her twin-born hostages of fortune, his son and daughter. If, as was natural on this eventful day, his heart swelled with the pride of paternity and a father's love, what height of ecstasy might not this humble workman have reached could he have seen through the curtain of the future and read the horoscope of that first-born boy of his, who was destined to write his name on one of the loftiest tablets of the immortals in the Temple of Fame! But this was not to be.

For three generations the Forrests belonged to that restless race of pioneers who in search of home and fortune had followed close upon the heels of the savages, as these were driven farther and farther towards the setting sun. While there was yet a narrow fringe of civilization along the Atlantic coast, they were content to dwell among the foot-hills of the eastern slope of the Alleghanies. But when the hardy Anglo-Saxon race began in earnest to cross the sea and establish more numerous settlements there, these bold and self-reliant frontiersmen, with wives and children, packing up their small store of household goods, gathered in little colonies, yoked their oxen to the wagons, turned their backs upon the Atlantic, and, cutting as they went a trail across the Eastern Divide, plunged into the vast wilderness of the valley of the Mississippi.

ENDOWMENT AND DEVOTION

From 'The Life of General Nathan Bedford Forrest.'

WITH all this endowment by nature for the career of a soldier, he could not have achieved such results had there not been combined with this natural ability a spirit of devotion to the cause he had espoused, to which all else was a secondary consideration. To the success of the effort to establish the Southern Confederacy he subordinated his fortune, his boundless ambition, and freely offered his life. When the Confederacy was unable to furnish him with necessary supplies and arms, his private fortune was frequently called into requisition. The arms and equipment for his original battalion were thus secured, and on a single expedition into west Tennessee he spent some twenty thousand dollars of his personal funds in the purchase of supplies needed for the Confederacy. When the war ended, carrying with it great financial loss to him, that which was left he never ceased to share with the widows and orphans of those who had fallen in defence of his battle-flag, or the soldiers who were disabled and survived, until he left himself and his family practically bankrupt. This earnest devotion of the elder brother carried every able-bodied male member of his mother's family into the field, while his only child, then a mere lad, was permitted to quit college in order to serve with his father in active duty until the war was over. In one battle, in which his boy was injured and carried to the rear, the father, as soon as it was possible, went to see how dangerously his son was hurt. Upon being assured that the wound was not serious, he ordered him to mount his horse and to continue in the fight, which command the plucky lad was only too willing to obey.

General Forrest possessed not only a mind of unusual power, but one capable of reasoning calmly and rapidly, no matter how serious or perplexing the problems which presented themselves. Even in moments of extreme peril, so rapid was the process by which his brain registered, and analyzed every detail of the picture which flashed through it, that any action which the emergency demanded followed as logically and as quickly as the roar of the thunder follows the lightning's flash. The ordinary mind can deal with reasonable certainty and success with the things that are expected, but to cope successfully with the unexpected is the crucial test of extraordinary ability. In war, and especially upon the battle-field, it is the unexpected which most often happens, and in these great emergencies the mind is too often dazed by the rapid and kaleidoscopic changes which are occurring, or temporarily stunned by the shock of an unlooked-for stroke. It is on such occasions that he who hesitates is lost, and as in nature

Everything that grows
Holds in perfection but a single moment.

So in the crises of human affairs a single moment of time holds success or failure as the opportunity it brings is or is not grasped. Whether his life alone was in the balance, or whether the safety of his command was involved, this wonderful presence of mind did not fail.

When the attempt upon his life was made at Hernando, and again at Columbia, in 1863, even after he had received a severe and painful wound with a pistol of large calibre, his conduct was marked with as much deliberation and coolness as if nothing important was transpiring. In a larger sense this great gift of nature was exhibited at the battle of Parker's Cross Roads, in 1862, and had Forrest made no other campaign than this expedition into west Tennessee, and had fought no other battle, it would have stamped him as a commander of extraordinary capacity. Considering all the conditions which prevailed, the extrication of his command with insignificant loss, his retreat to the Tennessee River only a few hours away, and the safe passage of his troops, wagons, and artillery, with a victorious army at his heels and a fleet of gunboats patrolling the mighty stream which in the dead of winter he was compelled to cross, was an unequalled achievement.

In all of his military operations, to his quick grasp of the best strategic or tactical manœuvre, Forrest added a native cunning, which stood him well in hand in many of his ventures. This is evident in the constant exaggeration of the strength of his command. In the west Tennessee expedition, in 1862, with a small brigade of new levies, the first thing he did when well in the country occupied by the enemy was to arrest a number of Union sympathizers and place them under guard within the limits of his camp. Having carried a number of kettle and bass drums, he caused these to be beaten at all hours of the day and night, and had his troops march on foot in sight of the prisoners, who were informed that it was Cheatham's division of infantry passing by. When the men on foot had disappeared behind some dense wood or hill which intervened, they were made to return by another route, mount their horses, and again file by as cavalry over the road along which they had just paraded. These captives were then permitted to escape, and, as Forrest intended, made their way rapidly to the headquarters of the nearest Federal commander, and informed him of the great strength of the Confederate force, the soldiers of which made no secret of their intention permanently to occupy and hold that section of the country. The presence of Cheatham's division of infantry is repeatedly mentioned in the official despatches of the Union commanders at this date, and Forrest's cavalry was reported several times larger than the number of troops he actually commanded. The object of the expedition was not only to capture what supplies and prisoners he might come upon during the fortnight he was to remain in that section, but to cause the withdrawal from the immediate front of the Confederate army of as many of the enemy as possible. While Forrest did not have more than three thousand soldiers in this little army of invasion, it caused General Grant to detach, in order to drive him across the Tennessee, between twenty-five and thirty thousand men.

In the capture of Murfreesborough, in 1862, of Straight's command, in 1863, of Athens, Alabama, in 1864, and in many other instances, he repeated this practice.

General John T. Morgan relates that when, early in the war, with a new regiment thoroughly drilled and equipped, he was ordered to report to General Forrest, the latter was greatly pleased as well as surprised to observe the perfection of this regiment in drilling to the sound of the bugle. Forrest asked him if he could in this way cause his men to pass in a circle around any given point. The order was given and the movement was satisfactorily accomplished, at which the general expressed great satisfaction, saying: "I will often have need of this manœuvre, as it will be necessary from time to time for me to show more men than I actually have on the field."

FORREST'S FAREWELL

From 'The Life of General Nathan Bedford Forrest.'

It required all of Forrest's tact and influence with his troops to persuade them to the submission which he accepted. It is narrated in the History of the Seventh Tennessee Cavalry, one of the commands disbanded at Gainesville, that when the determination of the commander was made known to the men they were overwhelmed with amazement and grief. They gathered in groups to talk over the situation, while some of them wept like children. Many said they would never surrender as long as they had their guns and horses; they proposed to General Forrest to lead them to the trans-Mississippi Department, and to continue the struggle for independence; "but General Forrest said no, what could not be accomplished here could never be done in the thinly settled West." They finally realized, under the calm and convincing reasoning of their leader, the hopelessness of the fight, and with grim determination turned their faces homeward to meet an uncertain future. "The old bullet-torn flag, whose blue cross had been triumphantly borne aloft for years at the cost of so much blood and valor, they would never part with. On the eve of surrender, as the shadows of night fell, the men reverently gathered around the staff in front of regimental headquarters, and, cutting the silk into fragments, each soldier carried away with him a bit of the coveted treasure. The flag had been the gift of a young lady of Aberdeen, Mississippi, made from her bridal-dress, and had never for an instant been abandoned by the men of the Seventh Tennessee Cavalry after it was committed to their guardianship."

On the 9th of May, 1865, General Forrest took his farewell of these gallant men, in an address probably not excelled in the literature of the Civil War.

"Headquarters Forrest's Cavalry Corps,
"Gainesville, Alabama, May 9, 1865.

"SOLDIERS,—By an agreement made between Lieutenant-General Taylor, commanding the Department of Alabama, Mississippi, and East Louisiana, and Major-General Canby, commanding United States forces, the troops of this department have been surrendered. I do not think it proper or necessary at this time to refer to the causes which have reduced us to this extremity, nor is it now a matter of material consequence as to how such results were brought about. That we are beaten is a self-evident fact, and any further resistance on our part would be justly regarded as the very height of folly and rashness. The armies of Generals Lee and Johnston having surrendered, you are the last of all the troops of the Confederate States Army east of the Mississippi River to lay down your arms. The cause for which you have so long and manfully struggled, and for which you braved dangers, endured privations and sufferings, which we sought to establish and perpetuate is at an end. Reason indicates and humanity demands that no more blood be shed. Fully realizing and feeling that such is the case, it is your duty and mine to lay down our arms, submit to the 'powers that be,' and to aid in restoring peace and establishing law and order throughout the land. The terms upon which you were surrendered are favorable, and should be satisfactory and acceptable to all. They manifest a spirit of magnanimity and liberality on the part of the Federal authorities which should be met on our part by a faithful compliance with all the stipulations and conditions therein expressed. As your commander, I sincerely hope that every officer and soldier of my command will cheerfully obey the orders given, and carry out in good faith all the terms of the cartel.

"Those who neglect the terms and refuse to be paroled may assuredly expect when arrested to be sent North and imprisoned. Let those who are absent from their commands, from whatever cause, report at once to this place, or to Jackson, Mississippi, or, if too remote from either, to the nearest United States post or garrison, for parole. Civil war, such as you have just passed through, naturally engenders feelings of animosity, hatred, and revenge. It is our duty to divest ourselves of all such feelings, and, so far as it is in our power to do so, to cultivate friendly feelings toward those with whom we have so long contested and heretofore so widely but honestly differed. Neighborhood feuds, personal animosities, and private differences should be blotted out, and when you return home, a manly, straightforward course of conduct will secure the respect even of your enemies. Whatever your responsibilities may be to government, to society, or to individuals, meet them like men. The attempt made to establish a separate and independent confederation has failed, but the consciousness of having done your duty faithfully and to the end will in some measure repay for the hardships you have undergone. In bidding you farewell, rest assured that you can carry with you my best wishes for your future welfare and happiness. Without in any way referring to the merits of the cause in which we have been engaged, your courage and determination, as exhibited on many hard-fought fields, has elicited the respect and admiration of friend and foe. And I now cheerfully and gratefully acknowledge my indebtedness to the officers and men of my command, whose zeal, fidelity, and unflinching bravery have been the great source of my past success in arms. I have never on the field of battle sent you where I was unwilling to go myself, nor would I now advise you to a course which I felt myself unwilling to pursue. You have been good soldiers, you can be good citizens. Obey the laws, preserve your honor, and the government to which you have surrendered can afford to be and will be magnanimous.

“N. B. FORREST, Lieutenant-General.”

Admirers and partisans of General Forrest bemoan the fact that his last campaign was not attended with the brilliant success which characterized his almost unbroken series of victories. It should be borne in mind that the fight against General Wilson was made under circumstances which placed the Confederate leader at great disadvantage. His command was greatly inferior in numbers to that of his able adversary, and much of it was composed of a material upon which he could not with confidence rely. General Grant, in his Memoirs, in commenting upon the relative strength and efficiency of these contending forces, says: “Wilson moved out with full twelve thousand men, well equipped and well armed. He was an energetic officer and accomplished his work rapidly. Forrest was in his front, but with neither his old-time army nor his old-time prestige. He now had principally conscripts. His conscripts were usually old men and boys. He had a few thousand regular cavalry left, but not enough to even retard materially the progress of Wilson’s cavalry.”

WILLIAM LOWNDES YANCEY

WILLIAM LOWNDES YANCEY

[1814—1863]

GEORGE PETRIE

LIKE Thomas Jefferson, William Lowndes Yancey is supposed to have been of Welsh descent. His ancestor is said to have come to Virginia with Governor Berkeley in 1642. His grandfather fought in the Revolution with Virginia troops, and at its close settled in South Carolina. His father was a young midshipman on the Constitution during its fights with the French ships L'Insurgente in 1799 and La Vengeance in 1800, but afterward practiced law in South Carolina, where he soon became known as an able lawyer and brilliant speaker. His mother was Miss Caroline Bird of Warren County, Georgia. At her home, called the "Aviary" from the name of her family, William Lowndes Yancey was born, August 10, 1814.

Three years later his father died, and his training and early education devolved entirely upon his mother. She made him practice constantly in the art of speaking, and it seems almost prophetic that his favorite piece for declamation was the old hymn, "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand." He attended the well-known Mount Zion Academy, in Hancock County, Georgia, which was then under the direction of the Rev. N. S. S. Beman of New York. Yancey's mother soon married his teacher and the family moved to New York. After the usual academic training in the North, he entered Williams College, where he was a hard student and a regular contributor to the college journal.

Unwilling to be a burden longer on his step-father's resources, which were slight at best, he left college before graduation, returned to the State of his father, and began the study of law at Greenville, South Carolina. He had the good luck to get a position in the office of B. F. Perry, afterward Governor of the State, who writes of him as follows: "He was a very young man when I made his acquaintance (nineteen years old). I was charmed by his pleasing and cordial manners, prepossessing appearance, and intellectual endowments. He read law in my office one or two years, and then gave evidence of that brilliant career in politics which he afterward ran. . . . In a time of high political excitement in South Carolina, he addressed large mass meetings with great success. . . . He was a man of talent and genius: a man of impulse and deep feeling. He spoke with extraordinary fluency and clearness of statement. . . . He wrote as forcibly as he spoke, and with great rapidity. In company he was the merriest of associates, but when left to himself, he was meditative to sadness."

Greenville was in the heart of the up-country section of South Carolina, where nullification found little favor. It is not surprising, therefore, that Yancey opposed that movement with all his youthful energy. He was not yet of age, but the charm of his personal appearance, his musical voice—always the wonder of those who heard him—his skill as a speaker, recalled his father vividly to the minds of those who had known him. Toward the close of the contest he assumed the editorship of the Greenville Mountaineer, in the columns of which, with characteristic frankness and boldness, he opposed any compromise with nullifiers.

In 1835 he retired from journalism. A few months later he married Miss Sarah Caroline Earle, the daughter of a well-to-do planter near Greenville, and settled down to the life of a planter—a business that always had for him, as for most Southerners of that day, a great attraction. The next year he joined the tide of emigration then setting strongly toward the rich lands of Alabama, whither relatives and friends had preceded him. He settled in Dallas County, but soon removed to the more healthful neighborhood of Wetumpka, and divided his time between agriculture and journalism. Southern traditions and his own choice led him toward the plantation, but his aggressive energy and a natural instinct for public life impelled him strongly toward the press. An accident determined his course. During a feud between two overseers his slaves were all poisoned. Ruin stared him in the face. Honest and uncompromising by nature, he refused to take advantage of the bankruptcy law, and devoting himself wholly to his newspaper and the law, he paid his debts dollar for dollar.

He was still barely twenty-six when the spectacular presidential campaign of 1840 drew him irresistibly into the field of public debate. The ability that he displayed led at once to his election to the Legislature. A distinguished Alabamian, who by chance was present while the Legislature was in session, wrote of him, "I have met many men, called great. None ever excited in me the lively interest that Mr. Yancey did. I say confidently that he was the most fascinating man I ever knew." No great questions came before the Legislature while he was a member of it; but it was composed of free men who knew no "boss's" rule, and many questions of local importance were freely and earnestly discussed, and the State Constitution as well as the National Constitution were frequently appealed to and analyzed with a keenness that gave excellent training to the young statesman. His frank and outspoken manner pleased the people, as did his ability and eloquence, and in 1844 he was elected to Congress. His canvass was a remarkable one. There was not a railroad in his district, yet he traveled over it all, made a hundred speeches, and the campaign did not cost him five dollars—an interesting commentary on his honesty as well as on the hospitality of the times.

In Congress his maiden speech was made in reply to a Whig, Mr. Clingman, of North Carolina. It was so vigorous as to attract wide attention throughout the country, and so scathing as to bring on a duel with Clingman. Shots were exchanged, explanations followed, and the incident seemed closed. But the law of Alabama debarred from office all duelists, and the point was pressed by some who opposed the practice. The Legislature, however, came to his help by passing over the Governor's veto a special act to relieve him of his disability—partly because of their regard for Yancey, and partly no doubt because of a lingering sympathy with the code duello.

Other speeches rapidly increased his fame. He was called "the Fox of America," and was invited to speak in New York, Baltimore, and other cities. He took an active part in the great Congressional debates of that time about Texas, Oregon, the tariff, internal improvements, and other matters. But popular applause increased the dread which he always felt of being considered a mere rhetorician, and he stuck more and more closely to argument and even to statistics.

In the midst of this brilliant success, Yancey suddenly resigned. This act was the result of the profound conviction, to which his observation and experience in Congress led him, that on great financial questions the national Democratic party was not sound, "that in such a party organization the South, which is the only portion of the party sound on these questions, is used merely to foot the bill and to aid in securing to the party a power which shall give to our Northern brethren the spoils."

This arraignment of the Northern Democrats was made upon questions of finance, which still retained some of the importance that had attached to them during the Jacksonian era. But Yancey's favorite saying that "principle is dearer than mere party association" was soon to find a new and more vigorous application in connection with the question of slavery. One month later, Wilmot of Pennsylvania introduced in Congress his famous resolution that in all territory acquired as the result of the Mexican War, which was then drawing to a close, slavery should be forever prohibited. This precipitated a bitter sectional controversy throughout the whole country.

In Yancey's own State it called forth the once-famous Alabama Platform, so called because it was adopted by the State Democratic Convention in 1848. This was largely the work of Yancey, and was urged by him in a brilliant speech which swept away all opposition. No other document has exercised so strong an influence on the history of Alabama. No other was linked so long and so closely with Yancey's name. The two vital points in this platform were, first, that neither Congress nor a territorial Legislature could prohibit slavery in the territories; second, that Alabama would support no candidate for the Presidency of the United States unless he indorsed this doctrine. It was at once adopted by nearly all the Southern States, and Yancey became the hero of the hour. In these resolutions and in his speeches he demanded what he believed to be the full constitutional rights of the South. But when the crisis came more moderate views prevailed, and the compromises of 1850 were accepted. He himself had no faith in these measures as a just or a permanent solution of the problem.

Four years later the whole question was opened anew by the Kansas-Nebraska Bill. From that time until the State seceded in 1861, Yancey devoted his marvelous talents and his untiring energy to the task of persuading the Southern States to accept no further compromises, but to demand their full constitutional rights. His influence more than anything else led his State in 1860 to adopt again the Alabama Platform of twelve years before. It was his voice that pleaded for those principles before the Charleston convention with such power that the speech has become one of the landmarks at once of history and of eloquence. And when once more, as in 1848, the national party refused to unite on the principles that he and his sympathizers demanded, and the party split into two wings, Yancey was the most effective advocate of Breckinridge, not only because of his natural eloquence, but because the principles for which he now pleaded had been his creed for years. No one doubted his sincerity when he said: "I have given my mind, heart, character and fortune to raise the Southern mind to the full view of Southern rights." Not only did he speak amidst scenes of the wildest enthusiasm in Memphis, Richmond, Nashville, New Orleans, and other Southern cities, but in such Northern cities as New York, Boston, and Cincinnati he defended the Breckinridge platform with a frankness and honesty that won the approval of his opponents.

His courage and eloquence struggled in vain against the inevitable; Lincoln was elected. The significance of this, according to Yancey's judgment, lay in the fact that it was one of a series of acts which, taken collectively, showed a determination on the part of the Northern people to violate the constitutional rights of the South. Others thought differently, but his mind was made up. On the night after the election, he urged the speedy secession of Alabama. He expected that other Southern States would join the movement and that it would succeed; but the possibility of failure did not change his mind. "As for myself," he said, "rather than live on subject to a government which breaks the compact at will and places me in a position of inequality . . . I would in the cause of my State gather around me some brave spirits, who, however few in number, would find a grave which the world would recognize as a modern Thermopylæ."

With the formation of the Confederacy his chief work was done. His mission to England attracted some attention and aroused high hopes in the South; but he was by nature a poor diplomat; he had no experience in such matters, and the task was in itself well-nigh impossible. It is not surprising that he accomplished nothing. Returning home, he entered the Confederate Senate, and performed the duties of his office with his usual honesty and ability. But the war, which consciously or unconsciously he had done so much to bring about, had now passed into the control of other hands. The soldier and not the orator held the center of the stage. Perhaps it was fortunate that he did not live to see the failure of the Confederacy. On July 27, 1863, he died in Montgomery, still hopeful of its success.

When one turns from the active scenes in which Yancey's life was spent to the judicial task of weighing critically his words and deeds, many perplexing problems arise. Upon the great question whether his bold policy was the wisest, or whether a more conciliatory one might have been better, it is still too soon to speak positively. But, whatever may be thought of the policy that he advocated, there is no question as to his ability and his influence on ante-bellum history. For weal or for wo, he played an important part in it. He was the greatest popular expounder of the doctrine of States' Rights, upon which more and more Southerners of all schools came to base their theories of political rights. Even to those who lack the patience to follow his constitutional arguments, he must possess an abiding interest as the ardent leader of Southern thought and sentiment, who by his boldness, his earnestness, and his eloquence did more than anyone else to make the States' Rights doctrine of Calhoun a powerful force in practical politics.

In character he was before all else thoroughly sincere and frank. His mind was methodical with a strong legal trend, yet he had a way of touching at once, as if by intuition, the vital point in complex questions. His demeanor was usually calm and often genial, yet there was always an undercurrent of intense earnestness and persistency of purpose, and he was at times stirred by the most profound emotion. His greatest faults were his impatience of opposition and his inability to sympathize with and to coöperate with those who differed from his own views. His patriotism was lofty and pure, but in his heart his own State and his own section came first. He loved the Union and the Constitution, but was ready to give up both when he thought they were strained to the injury of the South.

His eloquence was in keeping with his character. It was free from all artificiality. There were no rhetorical passages, no studied phrases, no carefully planned flights of the imagination. It was direct and bold, full of vigorous but simple reasoning, and always warmed and illumined by strong and contagious emotion. He gesticulated but little and seldom moved about upon the platform, yet his whole body showed his earnestness. All who heard him agree that his voice was the most wonderful they had ever known. No audience was too vast to be reached by it, yet he never seemed to exert it. It was melodious, full of varied tones, and reflected his meaning and his feeling perfectly.

Had the Confederacy succeeded, his name would have become as familiar as that of Patrick Henry; as it failed, he awaits the judgment of posterity.

WASHINGTON'S TRUE LEGACIES

[In behalf of the ladies of the Mount Vernon Association, a field-glass used by Washington was presented to Mr. Yancey, who responded in the following address. February 23, 1858.]

I RECEIVE this venerable and most interesting relic with an unfeigned consciousness that it is not due to any poor efforts of mine, but that I rather owe it to that generous regard which woman so freely lavishes upon all who co-operate with her in any cause which she proposes for either public or private good. But this only makes my fealty to the Mount Vernon Association the greater and more absolute. As the knight of the age of chivalry, when he placed the scarf of his lady fair across his steel harness, felt that he best did his devoir in her service by proclaiming the supremacy of her virtue and her beauty in every listed field, where valor paid its court to beauty, so do I, even in this more material age, feel that the only efficient way in which I can acknowledge the bestowment of this high honor, is by wearing near to my heart this beautiful and holy cause of the ladies, and on all proper occasions, where the intelligence and patriotism of the land may be assembled, to present it, as best I may, to their judgment and to their sympathies. That cause is the consecration, by the daughters of Washington, of the Home and the Grave of the Father of his Country as a national shrine.

Sir, when the hand of Washington first grasped this glass, and deliberately surveyed the beleaguered lines of the enemy before Boston, the startling and apparently hopeless character of the contest upon which the colonies had entered, must have been deeply impressed upon his mind. Perhaps there never lived another man whose heart would not then have sunk within him, and whose judgment would not have been convinced of the hopelessness of the contest, considered with reference to great military principles. On the one side were an undisciplined multitude, held together by no allegiance to military law, remaining or deserting almost at will; no foundries; no munitions of war; no navy; no famed leaders; no common government; and the resources from which the materials of war were to be drawn, existing but scantily in a population of but three millions of people scattered along the Atlantic coast for fifteen hundred miles. On the other the most powerful kingdom the earth has ever seen—with disciplined armies, commanded by generals of fame and experience, all armed in the completest panoply of war; with a numerous and efficient navy, which swept the seas in triumph; with a government powerful in its unity, and consolidated by the influence of centuries; with resources as exhaustless as the riches of a world which was made tributary to its arms and its commerce.

That great disparity, however, while appreciated by the commander of the revolutionary army, produced no despondency in his breast. Calm and undismayed, sustained by Christian trust in that great Providence that had formed his character for the exigencies of the age—he addressed himself to the task of bringing order out of confusion—of infusing hope into the hearts of the despondent—courage into the breasts of the quailing—patriotism into the bosom of the doubting—of influencing provincial legislatures to enlarged and self-sacrificing views of their duties and obligations—of quelling sectional jealousies and allaying personal bickerings among the men of influence—of checking ill considered legislation in the national Congress, and of suggesting those wise and comprehensive measures, which though but partially enacted, finally proved efficient—of organizing the most incomplete material for an army that was ever furnished to sustain a great cause—of checking that too ardent valor, which, though it might be productive of brilliant victories for the day, would have ensured disastrous defeat for the morrow—of keeping alive the hope and spirit of the army and the people, by occasional enterprises of daring offensive movements with the most inadequate means—of risking battles which could not be productive of victory, but which stern necessity demanded as preferable to giving way to despair, and finally, when the hour arrived in which a watchful Providence gave hope that all these great and heroic exertions should not be in vain, of enveloping the mighty ranks of Britain in a series of masterly strategic movements which forced a surrender at Yorktown and crowned the struggle with immortal victory! Then this glass was closed by the still calm and mighty chieftain, upon a scene of such sufferings, trials, and triumphs as is rarely sketched on the pages of history. And then was the great lesson taught which Virginia has seized upon to illustrate her arms, and which is to be read upon the blue field of her flag as it is flung to the breeze—“Sic semper tyrannis.”

Washington went into that contest the trusted leader of our armies. He emerged from it with the character of being not only the great soldier, who could turn the exigencies of a defeat to the purposes of a victory, but the great statesman, whose calm, well-balanced and powerful understanding had comprehended the wants—the necessities—the actual exigencies of the occasion, and had suggested many of the chief measures which ensured the safety and success of the common cause. I think, sir, that I do this great character but common justice in saying that efficient as that sword was in carving the path to victory, its mightiest and equally potent ally was his pen.

A celebrated Irish martyr said, as he received the announcement of his death warrant—“When my country takes her place among the nations of the earth, then, but not till then, let my epitaph be written.”—Alas! the epitaph of Emmett is yet unwritten.

But how is it with our numerous gallant dead? Well has Weems described their condition—with few exceptions, as they lie undistinguished from New Hampshire to Georgia—in his touching description of the grave of De Kalb: “’Tis the lowest spot upon the plain, no sculptured marble marks the spot where the dead hero lies—but the tall corn stand in martial ranks around, and the dark green leaves rustle a mournful requiem over the grave of the gallant soldier.”

And yet our country has taken its place in the front rank of nations. The American flag floats over a territory more rich in all the elements of physical wealth and more extensive than the proud eagles of Rome ever compassed in their mightiest flight. Our population from three to thirty millions of active, intelligent, powerful freemen. From the narrow belt of civilization which fringed the Atlantic coast in 1776, the swollen ranks of emigration have pushed their way over valley and river and plain and mountain—carrying with them our beneficent institutions, until at last they have paused upon the golden sands of California, and the genius of America, standing upon the golden verge which is watered by the tides of the Pacific, doubts which way to essay another flight.

From a nation without a ship, we have become the navigators of the world, with a tonnage surpassing, I believe, that of any other. Our agriculture is looked to as Egypt was of old, to supply the starving millions of the old world.

In all the elements of real physical science—in all the arts which are necessary to the well being and happiness of a free and a wealthy people, I believe, I may truly say that we are unrivalled. It is true, that England, France, Germany, Italy and even China and Japan, may excel us in the production of some of the refinements of art. But we array with them in no contest for supremacy in that department. As the beautiful pearl is the product of the diseased and dying shellfish, so such mere elegancies of art are but evidences of the unhappy condition of that society where labor is commanded by want and the laborer dies in the finish of the most elaborate gem of luxury.

Our great institutions have been successfully demonstrated to be the only true theory of government, while religion and morality, its attendant sister, have erected their altars at which millions worship, in every form of faith and sentiment all over our broad extended land.

These are the priceless legacies which Washington and his compeers have bequeathed to us.

What, then, may well be asked, are our duties, in reference to these facts? The first undoubtedly is, to preserve and perpetuate these noble institutions; to read aright, and learn and infuse our souls with the lessons of his life. Of all these teachings, the least, and that in which the subjects of the crowned despotisms of the old world are alike with him, a teacher, is one which most eulogists dwell upon as the main lesson he taught—mere fealty to government.—In vain was that glorious life if he lived but to impress upon mankind no higher thought. Embodied in yonder monumental brass; embalmed in his storied memory, is that other immortal, new-born, American principle—that all governments were made for the benefit of the governed; that all authority rightfully springs from the people, and that it is not only their right, but their duty to subvert a government which becomes destructive of the end for which it was formed, and to frame a new government to preserve their rights. Washington commenced the scenes which led to the revolution a loyal subject of the crown; he emerged from that strife the consecrated American rebel, who had pledged "life, fortune, and sacred honor," to the cause. But alas! sad, mournful will be the day, when we shall have drawn forth from their sacred recesses these mighty, yet blood-stained truths to justify us in the eyes of an enlightened world. And, sir, that day will never arrive, so long as the sons of Washington will observe in their relations with each other that high sense of duty, that spirit of simple justice, and observance of what is due to others, which distinguished their mighty father in other relations of life.

One other duty we owe to the great dead. It is to illustrate our reverence for their memories by a free and generous contribution to every cause which is calculated to bring visibly before us the virtues and heroism of that age of patriotic wisdom and valor. And yet, though more than half a century has passed since he died, there is not one single evidence of national gratitude for his services existing.

The resolve of the Congress of the year 1800, to bury his remains in Washington, and to build over him a great monument commemorative of the national grief and the nation's loss, is yet unexecuted.

The resolve of a few patriotic citizens to atone in some measure for this national neglect, by seeking the voluntary contributions of the people, and therewith building in the Federal city a shaft of marble five hundred feet high, whose broad and deep foundations and summit piercing the very heavens, should attest in some faint degree, the depth, breadth and sacred character of the people's love for Washington, has failed of success—that unfinished shaft—but little over one hundred feet high, now covered over with rough boards—the tools which lie rusting in rude neglect at its base—the vacant and silent quarries, which no longer resound with efforts to disembowel the marble from the bosom of the earth, wherewith to elevate it—all solemnly, yet silently, attest the unhappy failure of this attempt of the sons of Washington to wipe out from their national escutcheon the stain of ingratitude which is eating its way there into a permanent resting place. And now, one more effort is being made. The sweet and gentle and silver-toned voice of woman is heard, beseeching her brothers that they permit her to aid them in the holy privilege of securing and consecrating the home and grave of their common and adored father as a national shrine. She points to the sacred spot where sleeps so quietly, so neglected, so undistinguished by any mark of a nation's or a people's love—the remains of the Father of his Country. In the bosom of Mount Vernon he sleeps—

Sleeps the sleep that knows no waking;
 Dreams of battle-fields no more;
 Days of danger—nights of waking.

And the trees that he planted, and under whose growing shade he loved to repose, now annually cover his couch with their brown mantles; and each leaf as it falls noiselessly to the ground, attests the gross national and popular neglect which so painfully enshrouds the spot.

* * * * *

It is not presumption to say here, to-night, in this presence, that this cause shall not fail! Is it a vain reliance to rest securely on the noble instincts of the great heart of the American people, in favor of a cause which reason, poetry, sentiment, love of country—of its past glories and future destinies—which pride, gratitude and the world's acclaim alike approve? Can a cause fail whose aim is to consecrate a father's tomb, as a shrine at which all of his descendants may bow in reverence and love, and there teach their children lessons of patriotism and duty, which may cause them to be as Washington?

What are the availing elements of failure in a cause which in the midst of the feast which proud ambition spreads for the gifted, has fallen on the ear and enlisted the advocacy of one of the most refined and cultivated intellects in the world of letters—of one of the most distinguished statesmen and diplomatists of this great nation—of one of the most accomplished rhetoricians of this age—of one of the purest men in a land, distinguished for Christianity?—of a cause which in every Southern State has received the cordial and earnest support of women, who stand at home and abroad distinguished for every accomplishment and virtue which makes women lovely and adorable—which has called to its aid hundreds of earnest and strong intellects, scattered here and there throughout the land?

What an array of talent, of virtue, and of moral influences are to be found thus disinterestedly appealing to the most generous and holy instincts of the people, to raise a comparatively trifling sum to secure this incomparably noble end!

Sir, it cannot, will not fail! You, and I and others may fail to link our names and memories with its success, but succeed it will; and Mount Vernon will become that holy shrine, within whose hallowed precincts, even in the event that this Union shall be shattered and broken in the conflict of sectional aggression, its alienated citizens may still meet, and, in the shadow of the tomb of the mighty dead, learn to sorrow for its destruction.

But whatever fate awaits us, do thou, O Virginia, thou, the mother of states and of statesmen—thou, mother of the glorious dead—thou, the mother of the great and gifted living—thou, from beneath whose mighty heart sprung that son, whose life so resplendently illustrates thine own, and the annals of his whole country, and into whose ample bosom his ashes have returned, guard well the sacred trust of that double maternity, and while to the valor of thy sons shall be committed its security, permit gentle woman to become the vestal priestess at the shrine!

EQUAL RIGHTS IN A COMMON GOVERNMENT

Speech delivered at Washington, D.C., September 21, 1860.

FELLOW-CITIZENS, I am no party man, and I do not address you as a party man to-night. Strange as it may seem to you, after what you have heard from some quarters, I come before you this evening as the friend of the Constitution and the Union under the Constitution, and as the enemy of any other Union, coming from what source it may.

My friends, there is one issue before you, and to all sensible men but one issue, and but two sides to that issue. The slavery question is but one of the symbols of that issue; the commercial question is but one of the symbols of that issue; the Union question is but one of those symbols; the only issue before this country in the canvass is the integrity and safety of the Constitution. He is a true Union man who intends to stand by that Constitution with all its checks and balances. He is a disunion man who means to destroy one single letter of that sacred instrument. It has been said that the South asks you to trespass upon the constitutional rights of the other States; it is said that the South seeks to aggrandize itself at the expense of other sections; that we want this Government to carry slavery and force it upon a people who do not desire it. With all proper respect for those who say this, I, as a Southern man, say that in every iota of its utterances it is false. The South has aggressed upon no section. She asks no section to yield anything that is for her safety or for her protection. All that the South has ever asked of the Government is to keep its hands off us and let the Constitution work its own way. The South has been aggressed upon; the South has been trenced upon; four-fifths of her territory, in which she has equal rights, has been torn from her; and by the acts of Government she has been excluded from it. Revenues have been raised at the rate of two or three dollars in the South to one from any other section for the support of this great Government, but the South makes no complaint of mere dollars and cents. Touch not the honor of my section of the country, and she will not complain of almost anything else you may do; but touch her honor and equality and she will stand up in their defence, if necessary in arms.

All, then, that the South asks in this contest is that you shall observe the constitutional checks and balances with reference to her. She is not willing that her rights shall be submitted to the will of mere numerical majorities. For our fathers, our ancestors, and the great patriots of the North agreed that it should be otherwise. It was the written compact of our fathers that the minority should receive protection from the Constitution against the mere selfish and avaricious will of a preponderant majority. Parties divided themselves originally in this country upon that great principle. One desired that the majority should rule in all things, while the other—the State Rights party of the Country—desired it should be different. This latter party carried the day in the formation of the Constitution and placed checks upon the advancement of the majority. And this written Constitution was the compact by which majorities should restrain themselves with reference to the rights of minorities. Majorities need no protection save their own power. Hence it is easy for the North to cry out for the Union at all hazards and under all circumstances. It is easy for the North, with its majorities of millions, to say they are for this Union anyhow. No matter who may be elected, no matter what may be done, still they will stand to the Union as the great cause of their prosperity. Why? Because, with no constitution at all, the North can protect themselves with the predominant vote in the country. But how is it with the South? How is it with the minority of the country—the minority States of the Government? If they leave it to the mere will of preponderant majorities in Congress, the North, as in all other cases, will seek its advancement of power, will seek its own selfish aggrandizement, and will distribute the money of the Government among themselves, raise as much as they please, and do all for their own advancement at the expense of minorities. Minorities, gentlemen, are the true friends of our Constitution, because that Constitution is their shield and their protector against the unchecked and unlicensed will of the majority.

Hence it is that my section of the South stands by that Constitution. You do not hear so much said there with such flippant tongues about the Constitution as you do at the North; but you hear much said there about the Constitution, about its strict construction—about the rigid enforcement of its checks and its balances in favor of these minorities, because to them it is a thing of life and death. Within this Government that Constitution must prevail, or the minority will be placed as a “lamb that is led to the slaughter.” But let that Constitution be preserved, and the South is content to abide its fate under the workings of that instrument. The North may well cry out Union! Union! Union! at all hazards and to the last extremity. And the North, even now, I understand, at midnight, is arming itself and training its midnight bands for the purpose of enforcing the Union of a mere majority upon the South. I understand these are “Wide Awakes,” as they call themselves—that is, they think themselves very “wide awake,” but they will find some men in the Southern States, gentlemen, sufficiently “wide awake” to meet them. A brave people and a true people, gentlemen, will fear no “Wide Awakes.”

No man is more wide awake than he who loves his own fireside, his own wife, and his own child, and aggresses on nobody, but determines as far as God gives him power, that nobody shall aggress on him. And there are no men who hear me to-night who would flinch like cowards if they found that others were merely bent upon aggressing upon their people when they could do so! As a distinguished friend of mine said to me the other day, the battles of the Revolution were fought with shotguns. Our people were not furnished with the great armament of modern warfare then, but being armed with the right, they were enabled to meet the powerful array of the then greatest nation of the earth, and wipe out the British lion from the country.

Now, I desire simply to say to you to-night that the South, standing on nothing but the Constitution, fears no aggression, fears no section, and that Constitution the South intends to stand by. If, in the progress of party division and party elections, that Constitution shall be trampled under foot; if a Government shall be instituted here which shall be a usurpation of the Government of Washington and our fathers; if this temple of liberty, based upon that Constitution, shall be subverted, and, instead of a Constitutional Government a “higher-law” Government shall be established, you will find, gentlemen, that the Constitution will have friends, even in that hour; and if driven from all other sections of the country, and there is no spot where the ark of the covenant of our safety can rest and be protected, it will be on Southern soil, where the friends of the Constitution live.

We do not desire, at the South, disunion; I know of but few advocates at the South of this measure. I can point to hundreds of distinguished Northern men who are far in advance of any men at the South upon the question of disunion. I know, in the Northern States, men who want a “higher-law,” who want a different Constitution, who want another Bible—aye, and who, in religion, even call for another Jesus Christ. Disunion, per se, exists in that union. I know of no disunion, per se, at the South. The humble individual who addresses you to-night has probably been more denounced as a disunionist than almost any other man in the Union. I tell you, gentlemen, my disunionism consists in this: I stand by the Constitution. I intend that the provisions of the Constitution, which I look upon as the shield of the South in this Union, shall be carried out and enforced. If that Constitution is taken away from the South in this Union, and the South is then to remain in the Union, I consider that we would then have no rights, for we would then be placed at the feet of a dominant, sectional, abolition majority. I say then, that the South stands by the Constitution, as a shield in this Union. When this shield shall be taken from their breasts by a dominant sectional majority, who seek to reduce this Government to the will of a mere majority, for its own sectional purposes, who intend to make us hewers of wood and drawers of water—we intend to take that Constitution with us; and, gentlemen, imitating the great example of George Washington, if there is no other place where we can erect and keep this Constitution, we will take the banner of liberty and plant it on the mountains, and there we will entrench ourselves as a body of freemen.

But, as I said to you, we hope that day is far distant from us, and that none of us may live to see its dawn. I, so help me God, will consider that to be an evil hour, when this Government shall be so rent by factions that the charter of our liberties shall be trodden under foot, and the compact of our fathers disregarded by their degenerate sons. It would indeed be an evil hour, but we are compelled to look it in the face. A large party, numbering in itself now, it is said, a plurality, if not a majority, of the people in this country is banded together with a discipline such as no other party has, having hopes which no other party has, led by men of eminent ability, with Abraham Lincoln its candidate, with Seward as its chief statesman and chief advocate, who from Maine to the furthest frontier of civilization, proclaims war, an "irrepressible war," upon the institutions of one half of this union; who proclaims, gentlemen, that the manner in which he interprets the constitution is that it shall give freedom to everything in human shape upon the face of the earth; who proclaims, gentlemen, therefore, that this Constitution which is based upon a recognition of negroes as an inferior race, that is based upon its recognition of property in slaves, that is based upon the recognition of slavery as a State institution, based upon its recognition as property which requires that property to be delivered up by the hostile states into which it may become fugitive—that this Constitution is to be utterly disregarded by him, and only his wild, insane, revolutionary and incendiary notions are the interpretations to be placed upon the constitution by this new government, if elevated to power.

Suppose that party gets into power; suppose another John Brown raid takes place in a frontier state; suppose "Sharp's rifles" and pikes and bowie knives, and all the implements of warfare are brought to bear upon an inoffensive, peaceful and unfortunate people, and that Lincoln or Seward is in the Presidential chair, where will then be a force of United States Marines to check that band? Suppose this is the case—that the frontiers of the country will be lighted up by the flames of midnight arson, as it is in Texas; that towns are burned; that the peace of our families is disturbed; that poison is found secreted throughout the whole country in immense quantities; that men are found prowling about in our land distributing that poison in order that it may be placed in our springs and our wells; with arms and ammunitions placed in the hands of this semi-barbarous people, what will be our fate?—Where will be the United States Marshals to interfere? Where will be the dread of this General Government that exists under this present administration? Where will be the fear of Federal officers of a United States army to intimidate or prevent such movements? Why, gentlemen, if Texas is now inflamed, and the peace of Virginia is invaded now under this administration, and under the present aspect of affairs, tell me what will be when a "higher-law" government reigns in the city of Washington? Where then will be our peace, where will be our safety, when these people are instigated to insurrection; when men are prowling about throughout this whole country, knowing that they are protected by an administration which says that by the Constitution freedom is guaranteed to every individual on the face of the earth? Can you expect any people of spirit or courage, true to themselves, true to their firesides, true to their own families—can you expect such a people, I say, to give up all regard for the Constitution, permit it to be trampled under foot, to acknowledge this “higher-law” government, to give it their assent—can you expect, I say, any brave and heroic people thus to be untrue to their families and their firesides, and to the great principles of eternal freedom and self-preservation?

We will preserve those rights, and those who would fail to rise in their defence are deserving of the execration and contempt, not of all mankind only, but of every republican who would place this government over us. We would deserve to be pitched out of this land into the sea, and drowned in the surf that breaks upon its shores. We would deserve that there should be no further propagation of such a race of cowards. We will remember that Washington, the greatest rebel the world ever produced, led the way in defence of the great principle of freedom—in defence of those institutions upon which our Government is based, and under which it has so long prospered as a nation.

I say to you, then, though we deprecate disunion, we will have the union of our fathers. It has been said that the South has aggressed upon the North.—When and where has my people ever aggressed upon the people of any other section? When and where has any Southern statesman proposed a wrong to be done to the West, the North-west, the East, or the North-east?

Never. History will proclaim it.—This age proclaims it. Our enemies will proclaim it by their silence when we defy them to answer the question.

Ours, then, is a position of defence within the limits of the Constitution. We uphold its banner. We intend to defend its principles. We ask only equal rights in our common government. We ask protection for these rights in our common government.—Nothing more, and, so help me God, we will submit to nothing less.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE UNION

An Address delivered at Montgomery, Alabama, November 10, 1860.

THIS night two weeks ago, I was asked, while speaking in New York, what course I would advise Alabama to take in the event that Lincoln should be elected President. Acting in perfect good faith to the issues presented by the party, whose cause I advocated, and which issues contemplated a solution of the political question at the ballot-box, within the Union, I declined to give utterance to my individual opinions, which could only tend to embarrass my friends, and to encourage their foes, but told the people of New York that I should cheerfully give that advice to my fellow-citizens of Alabama, whenever they should see fit to ask it; and I redeem that pledge to-night by saying that in my opinion the election of Abraham Lincoln to the office of President of the United States by the Black Republican party, taken in connection with his own political utterances, and the views and acts of his party in Congress, and in the several Northern States, is an overt act against the Constitution—against the Constitution and against the Union, and as such should be deemed sufficient cause for a withdrawal of the State of Alabama, and a resumption of all the powers she has granted to the Union, by separate State secession. And while giving utterance to this advice, I repudiate as utterly untrue, that in any just sense I am a Disunionist. If always to have advocated the right of all under the Constitution—if never to have assailed any single provision of that Constitution—if the advocacy of a policy of defence against wrong done to Southern rights—equality and honor within the Union constitutes a friend to that “more perfect Union” represented by the Constitution, then by universal acclaim I should be held to be a Union man, and if to-night I advise my state to withdraw herself from this Federal Government in order to protect her rights and the rights of her people from wrongs done to them by a violation of that Constitution by a numerical power that controls the Government, I have the judgment of the Constitution itself in my favor and against its violators, and am no Disunionist. But, I am not content with my own vindication. That with which we are falsely charged is true of our accusers. Look back at the history of our Government. I will not enumerate the list of grievances of which the Spirit of the Constitution complains—and about which our patriotic chief magistrate spoke so clearly to-night, but I will refer for a moment to the acts of the now dominant party upon the fugitive slave law. The Constitution calls for the enactment of this law in plain terms. One of the very first acts of our patriot sires was to enact a fugitive slave law. The Constitution, it is well known, could not have been formed, without the provision for the surrender of fugitive slaves. The Constitution, too, is a compact, not between the majority and the minority of the people of the United States, but between sovereign States. It was submitted to a Convention of each State for its adoption or rejection; and was for a long time in operation before two of the original Thirteen States concluded to come into the Union. It is then a compact between the States. How has that compact been kept by the Black Republican States? Twelve of them have passed laws nullifying the fugitive slave law and provision in the Constitution has made it a crime in their citizens to aid in its execution, punishing such action by heavy fine and imprisonment in the penitentiary. The compact, then, has been broken—the Union has been dissolved—the Constitution has been violated by this infamous party; and now, when we, one of the parties to that compact, propose to act on the well established principle that a compact broken in part is broken as a whole, if either party chooses so to consider it, the violators—the breakers of that compact—those who have themselves disrupted the bonds of Union, cry out treason! disunion! Fellow citizens, we have long been released from any obligation to continue in association with these Northern States under this broken, mutilated compact. And now, when the real, true Disunionists have, at last, elected a President—by a majority of electoral votes—by a majority of the popular vote—by a purely sectional vote, and propose to “inaugurate the policy of the irrepressible conflict into the Government—which is the end of slavery” (in Mr. Seward’s words) we propose to withdraw from beneath such usurpation and power, and protect ourselves.

There are other states, each and all having similar wrongs to complain of, and similar rights and institutions to save and protect. If any of those States wish a consultation with us and each other, it is our duty to afford a fair opportunity for a full, free, fraternal interview. Should that take place, I hope, as my friend Mr. Watts expressed it, that "we may all go out together." As Judge Goldthwaite expressed it, that "we will act together." But there is a point beyond that. In the contingency that consultation shall not produce concert—that all will not "act"—or "go out together," what then? Shall we like them linger yet within the desecrated portals of the Government—shall we remain and be all slaves—shall we remain but to share with them the disgrace of inequality and dishonor? God forbid! Let us act in that event for ourselves. I have good reason to believe that the action of any State will be peaceable—will not be resisted—under the present, or any probable prospective condition of Federal affairs. I believe there will not be power to direct a gun against a sovereign State. Certainly there will be no will to do so during the present administration. And if resisted, blood shed will appeal to blood throbbing in Southern bosoms, and our brethren from every Southern State will flock to defend the soil of a State which may be threatened by mercenary bayonets. It is not all of life to live, nor all of death to die. To do one's duty is man's chief aim in life. Better far to close our days by an act of duty—life's aims fulfilled, than to prolong them for years—years filled with the corroding remembrance that we had tamely yielded to our ease and our fears that noble heritage, which was transmitted to us through toil, suffering, battle and victory, with the condition that we likewise should transmit it unimpaired to our posterity. As for myself, rather than live on, subject to a government which breaks the compact at will, and places me in a position of inequality—of inferiority to the Northern free negro—though that life might be illustrated by gilded chains—by luxury and by ease, I would in the cause of my state gather around me some brave spirits, who however few in number, would find a grave, which my countrymen—the world and all future ages should recognize as a modern Thermopylæ!

ANNIE REESE LOCKE

MARTHA YOUNG was born at the country home of her parents in Hale County, Alabama. Her father was Dr. Elisha Young, an eminent physician and surgeon, who gave to the Confederacy four years of service as surgeon at Fort Morgan, Alabama, and after the war increased the reputation he had won in this position. He was still engaged in the practice of his humane profession when death came on November 6, 1898, in Greensboro, Alabama. Dr. Young's father was Colonel Elisha Young, an honor graduate of Princeton, who enjoyed in his day the reputation of being a statesman of note and an orator of great eloquence in the ranks of the old Whig party. Among his personal friends in political life was Henry Clay. The father of Colonel Young was Captain John Young, of Virginia, an officer in the Revolutionary Army. On her father's side Miss Young is descended from a line of distinguished men, whose services to their country and states gave them distinct standing.

Her mother was Anne Eliza Ashe Tutwiler Young, a woman who inherited a remarkable mind from her father, and emulated him in his attainments, for she was the daughter of Henry Tutwiler, of Virginia by birth, and of Alabama by adoption. Henry Tutwiler was among the first students matriculated in the University of Virginia, and, with his dear friend, Gessner Harrison, belonged to that division of the student body known in those early sessions for its laborious application and splendid attainments. He was the first recipient of the degree of Master of Arts, and reflected on his alma mater great honor by the significant use made of the learning his degree betokened. In Alabama he became founder and headmaster of the famous Green Spring Academy. Mr. Tutwiler's wife, Julia Ashe, was a granddaughter of Governor Samuel Ashe of North Carolina, a member of that distinguished group after whom Ashe County and Asheville were named. Through her maternal ancestors, Miss Young is a descendant of Sir James Yeamans, founder of Charleston, South Carolina, and through her paternal grandmother, whose name she bears, is connected with the well-known Strudwick family. Miss Young made her first appearance in print with a Christmas story, published in the Times-Democrat, of New Orleans, a paper noted for the encouragement it has always given to young Southern writers. This story appeared over the nom de plume of Eli Shepperd, and over this signature Miss Young's work continued to appear until her first book, 'Plantation Songs,' was published in 1901, by R. H. Russell. This book at once received high commendations, both North and South. The Springfield (Massachusetts) Republican thus noted it:

"That a negro song may be as sweet and attractive as if one of a more favored race were singing, has been proved by Paul Laurence Dunbar. Chestnut has shown that romance is as true with black as with white. Joel Chandler Harris has done much to illumine these features of the negro's character. Nothing has been done in this line before quite so good as this volume of plantation songs, by Eli Shepperd (Martha Young)."

Said the Journal, of Montgomery, Alabama:

"The book is as fresh as the breath of a crab-apple blossom in springtime. As Herrick shrined in meter the rural life of Devon hundreds of years ago for the delight of posterity, the author of 'Plantation Songs' has gathered and put away in literary lavender, with a picturesque touch, the gay and pathetic, the humorous and quaint scenes and events of negro life in the Alabama fields and swamps of to-day."

In 1902, the same firm brought out 'Plantation Bird Legends,' which confirmed her fame as one of the foremost dialect writers of America. "Her dialect verse," wrote Uncle Remus, "is the best written since Irwin Russell died. Some of it is incomparably the best ever written."

The Pittsburgh Gazette said:

"What the Brothers Grimm did, taking from the lips of unlettered peasants the folk-tales of the fore-time, and setting them down for the delight of children in all ages, has been done by Martha Young in her 'Plantation Bird Songs.'"

Several of her songs have been set to music by noted composers, and enjoy wide popularity.

Miss Young's next book was in an entirely different vein, for it was a child's book, entitled 'Somebody's Little Girl.' This was pronounced by the reviewers a most pleasing and perfect picture of a child's mind and heart.

This book, with her quaint legends, gave its author a place with the children by the side of Uncle Remus. Her other books are 'Fifty Folk-lore Tales' and 'In a Southern Garden.'

In another realm Miss Young has won high encomiums, for she is acknowledged as peculiarly gifted in the oral interpretation of her own productions. Her rendering of the negro dialect has been pronounced well-nigh perfect, and her readings in general give delight to both cultivated and popular audiences. Whether to a fashionable audience at the Waldorf-Astoria, a scholarly gathering in some university hall, to children in the public schools, or to a general audience, she brings fun and pathos, universal satisfaction and pleasure. A part of the impression she makes is due to her graceful, petite and attractive person. Her manners are charming, her conversation brilliant.

Miss Young has spent most of her life in her home in the little town of Greensboro, Alabama, but she has given to it variety by years in college, seasons in New York, and travels abroad. She is an ardent lover of nature, living much in the open, in the full enjoyment of riding and driving. There is not a wild flower of our woods and fields that she does not know and love.

MY LADY'S BANJO

From 'Plantation Songs for My Lady's Banjo and Other Negro Lyrics and Monologues,' New York, R. H. Russell, 1901.

Take you this tinkling instrument,
Strung up with gay and mad intent,
Strum it with dainty finger-tips—
It is a jester full of quips—
This gay banjo.

To the most sentimental sigh
With tittering tones it will reply,
And only laughter need expect
The answer that it would elect
From this banjo.

'Tis not a thing for serenades
Beneath the windows of fair maids:
No whit cares it for vows or tears;
It cuts sighs short—a pair of shears—
This bright banjo.

Yet to the maid of Africa,
 The ebon maid of Zanzibar,
 Its twanging measures might suggest
 Love thoughts she'd deem the tenderest—
 Her swain's banjo.

For hear the dusky lover sing,
 Shooting his fancies on the wing,
 An improvised, absurd love-song;
 He fits it as he goes along
 To his banjo.

THE WORLD'S HYMN

From 'Plantation Songs for My Lady's Banjo and Other Negro Lyrics and Monologues,' New York, R. H. Russell, 1901.

Oh, in dat awful day
 De moon in blood 'll drip away,
 Wile winds will arise,
 Rise wid breaf of all dat dies.

What will de Sinner-man do dat Day?
 He will go to his home to be driven away—
 Driven away!
 Driven away!

Skies gittin' grey wid gloom:
 John takes his shinin' broom—
 John sweeps hit far and nigh,
 Sweeps de stars from out de sky.

What will de Elder-man do dat Day?
 He will go to his home and dey 'll ax him to stay—
 Ax him to stay!
 Ax him to stay!

In dat one hour Day
 Oceans 'll bile away;
 Birds 'll forgit to fly
 All livin' 'bleeged to die.

What will de Hypocrit do dat Day?
He will knock at de do' and be driven away—
Driven away!
Driven away!

Dat Day what 'll light de sky?
De sun 'll rise des one hour high,
Den down dat sun will fall—
Come in, Seekers! Come in all!

What will de Church-Leader do dat Day?
He will tap at de do' and dey 'll ax him to stay—
Ax him to stay!
Ax him to stay!

Den when de Archangel sing
He 'll hide his face behin' his wing;
Prayers 'll roll from sho' to sho'
And Praise 'll rise ter set no mo'.

Sinner and Hypocrit 'fo' dat Day,
Can't you come in and plead to stay—
Plead to stay?
Plead to stay?

UNCLE AARON'S GREETING

From 'Plantation Songs.' Copyright, R. H. Russell, New York, and used here by permission of the publisher and author.

What! Come back from Santiago?
And wearin' his arm in a sling—
Lawsy marcy, ole 'oman, hear dat!
Don't dat beat ev'ything?
Take my hat off the peg, Jerushy,
I ain't had it down for a year;
Git my long-tail-black out de chist dar.
You! Handle dat coat wid keer:
Dat coat done been th'oo th'ee sessions—
Ole master, his pa and his son—
You hatter have 'spec' for a coat
Dat's been th'oo de years like dis one.

Hu! Yu! Den, I'm stiff in de jints,
 But walkin' 'll limber me some.
 Git my cane out de cornder, Jerushy;
 Now call dem boys: Lewis! oh, Lum!
 Come go wid gran'pa to de Gre't House—
 And come quick, you lazy young coons;
 Yo' Marse Tom is done come fum de wars
 Des teetotally kivered wid wounds!
 I feel now sorter like a gen'leman,
 Dar's virtue in dis coat, I believe,
 To make me feel most like a scholar
 Wid de larnin' dat ole master leave
 A-hangin' around in dese pockets,
 Or maybe slipped up in de sleeve.
 I feel now as proud as a sojer
 Off a day on a bravery leave.

ON THE PATH

Hol' up, chillen, de ole man 'bleeged to rest:
 Lemme set on dis log des a spell,
 I must wait twel my strengt' rises some'at—
 Good you cotch me—I most might a-fell!
 How quiet de fiel's and de country,
 As still as de ole gin in June.
 Dis a cu'us war anyhow,
Our war wa'n't played to dis tune!
 Des Marse Tom, and some one or two mo',
 Few several gone to de fight—
 Marcy! in our war my master
 And four hund'rd 'listed one night!
 Ev'y one had his several hosses,
 Nigger boy, nigger cook, nigger man;
 Besides from dis ve'y plantation
 Mos' a whole endurin' brass ban'.
 And us melt and roll into bullets
 Ev'y tea-pot and plantation bell,
 And us took ev'y plow off de stock
 When later us needed mo' shell.
 And all day de ladies picked lint,
 A-singin' to keep back de tears,

And de Quarter folks tried to raise corn
 Wid a passel er scrubby ole steers,
 'Caze our hosses all gone to de front,
 And our mules gone pullin' de guns,
 And dar wa'n't a white man to be seen—
 To de front—all—fathers and sons!
 Well times is obliged to change,
 And de ole ways is mos' wo' out:
 Young folks, and new ways, and new wars—
 Wonder what dis new war is about:
 Never heard of no Spanyards in my time—
 De Lord must have made 'em sence!
 In Cuba? Freein' mo' niggers?
 Dar's enough on dis side er de fence—
 A passel er skittish, free darkeys
 What won't let de ole folks larn 'em sence.

AT THE GREAT HOUSE

Marcy me! What's dat on de tower?
 A Yankee flag des as sho' as I'm born!
 Heah, chillen, slip down and hide
 Right heah in dis high, rustlin' corn—
 Dem Yankees sho' found dat Marse Tom
 Had des done come home for a spell,
 And dey done come and done took dat boy
 To deir Dry 'Tugas Prison, or hell!
 Dey done raise deir flag on our house!
 Gracious me! What else is dey done?
 I 'spec' neither man nor mouse
 Is left—not nairy a one!
 Is you crep' up and took a nigh look, Lum?
 Des tell de ole man what you see—
 Ole Marse and ole Miss on de gallery,
 As easy as easy can be?
 Don' tell me; Is dat flag a-flyin'
 What I think dat I think I see?
 Yas. And Lewis, you say dat Marse Tom
 Is come out on de front porch, too?
 Is you tryin' to fool yo' gran'daddy,
 Or tellin' him truf for true?

Well, come and le's go 'long and see
If dey is done surrender or not—
Is my Master done give up de place
Widout even parley or shot!

WHEN HE SEES HIS YOUNG MASTER

Lord, boy! Lord, chile! Lord, honey—
Our boy wid his arm in a sling—
Didn' I teach you to ride! You—Sonny!
Didn' I bait yo' fust hook? Ev'ything—
And to think you done been to de wars!
Yit dese arms can clarsp you onct mo'—
Bless de Lord for dis day, little massa!
Fer dis day!—But he-he! Ho-ho!
My soul, boy—De brass and de buttons—
Sojer-straps!—and des one heavy fight?
But—What's dis I see? Gracious me!
Tell me does my ole eyes see right?
Is—my boy heah got on de Blue?
Shoo—den—no—I scursely kin ax it—
Is you 'serted—and left us for true?
Don't you know dem grey cloze in de chist
In camphire laid up in de loft?
Don't you know how us cried when us fold 'em?
Even Marse hid a sob wid a cough.
Come heah! Boy! Tell me what is you done done?
Is I done load yo' fust musket
For you to be feared of a gun?
Huh! You laughin' at dis ole nigger?
Den tell me what all er dis mean,
'Caze dat flag and dese cloze is de beatenes'
Things my ole eyes even seen.
You say dat you follered Joe Wheeler
To de rifle pits down in Caney?
And you say Wheeler rallied 'em on
And won de whole glorious day!
Now, boy, dat talkin' sound good
In de good ole-fashion way.
But you say Wheeler rallied his men
Round dat flag, and led men from New York?

Den I sholy believe my senses
 Gwine ac' like a mustang—and balk!
 And us all one country now,
 Same as had no great war at all?
 Des call it de "late onpleasantness"—
 Gone like fust frost in de fall—
 Well, boy! Time changes and changes,
 Changes may be for better and all,
 But you ca'n't 'spec' a stupid ole nigger
 To stretch his mind round de whole ball.
 All I know is: Wid things gwine like you say
 Den us nigh to de Golden Sho'
 Whar dey eats des butter and honey
 And whar Yankees ain't Yankees no mo'.

HOW RED BIRD WON HIS COLOR

From 'Fifty Folk-lore Fables.' Copyright, and used here by permission of the author.

AWAY back days de red bird was as plain a color grey as de dove is to-day. He could hide hisse'f den des as commodious in de dry grass as any grey bird can to-day, he wa'n't dem days no sech a fire-red, red-rose bird as he is now, mo'n dat he wa'h't den sech a love-sign-bird as he is now.

How is he a love-sign-bird?

Dis how : If a gal see a red bird and don't make no 'miration 'bout she see him den dat gal gwine sho see her true love 'fo' next incomin' Saddy night.

One long time ago in bird matin' season Mister Red Bird done choose hisse'f a mate, little grey bird des like hisse'f. Him and her was singin' in de deep woods, singin' together, flyin' apart and den singin' together ag'in like birds does do, when dey heard sech a runnin' and breakin' th'oo de bushes. Mister Red Bird he fly for to see what can de matter be.

Dar in de deep woods he see Br'er Deer des runnin', he done des done pull his head out de honey hole whar Br'er Rabbit done fool him to stick it, and dar go Br'er Deer th'oo de wile woods, ain't see whar he gwine, his face all skint and red and raw and a-drippin' blood.

Mister Red Bird he got a mighty trimblin', tender heart and he feel so 'stressous for Br'er Deer dat he fly right up to him, and right up and down Br'er Deer's bleedin' face he fly, wipin' de blood offer Br'er Deer's face wid his wings. Up and down he flutter, wipin' Br'er Deer's face twel he git de blood stanch same as if Br'er Deer's face been wipe off wid cob-webs. Blood don't drip in Br'er Deer's eyes no mo' and Br'er Deer he can see de way clear to git safe home. But Mister Red Bird—dar.

When he done got th'oo wid wipin' off Br'er Deer's face wid his wings he didn't have a dry grey feather on him. He was teetotal blood-red all over. He was 'mersed in blood. He been blood-red ever sence. He's de reddest thing that goes, he's des as red as any rose.

MISTER BLUE BIRD'S DEBT

From 'Plantation Bird Legends.' Copyright, R. H. Russell, New York, and used here by permission of the publisher and author.

HAVIN' debts is de hongriest business dat dar is. Debts des eats inter you wid de mos' growin' appetite dat dar is: You keep payin', dey keep weighin'. All de time yo' end er de scale go up, and dey end er de scale go down. You gotter put in dat intrus'—puss-cent de 'Vancin' Men call it. It may be puss-cent when it git to dey pocket, but it's dollars when it leaves dis nigger's ole knit sock! Puss-cent, lawyer's fee, co't-cost, 'cordin' fee, mortgages—and now dey done put on something dat dey call de revenue! Well. Dar 's al'a's something new to pay. Ev'y year calls for de ole time pay and de new also. Dat way Mister Blue Bird talks all de year round, yet he keep a-singin' in de sunshine. Fust bird in de Spring dat you hear singin' hit's him, singin' like he don't owe a cent, but he owe de worst sort of a debt he do, he owe for his livin'. He been owin' dat debt sence de worl' was made, and he gwine be owin' it twel de worl' git wizzled.

You ax me who he owe?

He owe Cap'n Sparrer. He owe him wid all dat intrus' puss-cent, lawyer's fee, mortgagee, 'cordin'-fee and all Summer long de sparrers is a hollerin' at Mister Blue Bird:

Pay! Pay! Pay!
Ain't you gwine to pay!
When you gwine to pay!
Pay! Pay! Pay!

'Anyhow Mister Blue Bird he 'ford ev'ry year to git him a bran, new blue suit er cloze!

He's al'as fust man at de Spring 'Vival, and he's al'as dressed bran-broom-new!

Whar he git dem new cloze?

Now chillen, don't you ax me dat. Maybe de 'Vancin' man let him sell de seed, sech a good price is de cotton seed now!

Maybe Miss Blue Bird runs her a outside patch—I don't know, and you don't know and it ain't none er our business nohow!

But 'tain't long 'fo' fine as he do look he 'gin to git hongry and den he 'gin to be blue!

Den he swing on a limb and he sing low to Mis' Blue Bird:

Oh, la! Lu!

I feel blue—

What us gwine do

When de corn give out—?

Oh, la! Lu!

Now Mis' Blue Bird she ain't never so blue as he is, and she ain't studyin' 'bout nothin' but dat nest and dem eggs er hern, so she whistle back sorter keerless to him:

Can't you borrow
From Cap'n Sparrow?

Mister Blue Bird he mighty quick to take a idea like dat and he whistle back more jobly to her:

Oh, la! Lu—

Dat suit me, dat suit you—

Dat's what I'll do, dat's what I'll do!

Dat's des what I'll do!

Oh, la! Lu!

And dat's des what he do do, and I 'spec' while he's gittin' fat offer borrowed money he forgit all about dat puss-cent he gotter:

Pay! Pay! Pay!

Well if he do he ain't de fust one dat done des dat way. But you watch him in de Fall er de year—he busy den payin' on dat debt, he got no time to put up any nex' year providins for himself and his folks, he's busy payin' on dat debt. Des as soon as de shuck 'gin to git dry on de ear Cap'n Sparrow he set Mister Blue Bird on de old rail fence on de side er de big road for to be dey sparrers' watchman. He watch for dem sparrers whilst dey steal Mister Man's corn. And des as soon as he see any pusson comin' down de big road he whistle to dem sparrers:

You! You! You!
 Better had a-flew!
 Mister Man'll catch you!
 Catch you! Catch you!

Up flash de flock er sparrers, Mister Blue Bird right in behind 'em. Umph-humph, owin' debts is gwine to keep you behind.

You ax me chillen won't he never git dat debt payed? Naw. Not long as he do live and hard as he do work can he do mo' dan des keep up de intrus' and all de time Cap'n Sparrer, and his fambly, and his folks, and his cousins and his kin keeps right in behind Mister Blue Bird hollerin':

Pay! Pay! Pay!
 When you gwine to pay!
 Pay! Pay! Pay!

MAMAS OR JUST LADIES

From 'Somebody's Little Girl.' Copyright, and used by permission of the author.

. . . THERE were yet stranger things for Bessie Bell to learn.

She had not for long played with those many little girls in all sorts of clothes, and with larger girls, and with boys—some with short-striped-stockings-legs and some with long-striped-stockings-legs—before she heard one child say: "Mama says she will take me to Sweet Fern Cave to-morrow."

Or perhaps it was another child who said: "Mama won't let me wade in the branch."

Or another child said: "Mama says I can have a party for all the little girls and boys on the mountain next Friday!"

Then another little child said: "My Mama has made me a beautiful pink dress, and I will wear that to your party."

Mama? My Mama?

Bessie Bell leaned against the little fluted post of the gallery to the cabin where she and Sister Helen Vincula lived, and thought a great deal about that.

And Bessie Bell wondered a great deal what that could mean:

Mama? My Mama?

There were strange new things in this world.

Bessie Bell almost forgot to remember now, because every day was so full of such strange new things to know.

Mama? My Mama?

Bessie Bell did a great deal of thinking about that.

One day the little children were playing at building rock chimneys.

There was not much sand there for little children to play in, so that the children often built rock chimneys, and rock tables, and rock fences.

As they were playing one little girl suddenly left the playground and ran, calling: "Mama! Mama! Come here: come this way, and see the chimney we have built!"

Bessie Bell turned quickly from play and looked after the little girl who was running across the playground to where three ladies were standing.

The little girl caught the dress of one of the ladies, and came pulling at her dress and bringing her across the ground to see the stone chimney, and the little girl kept saying:

"Look, Mama! See, Mama! Isn't it a grand chimney? Won't it 'most hold smoke?"

Bessie Bell stood still with her little hands—they were beginning to be round pink little hands again, now—clasped in front of her and wondered.

"See, Mama! Look, Mama!" cried the little girl.

"Why does she say: Mama?" asked Bessie Bell, because she just wondered, and wondered—and she did not know.

"Because it is her Mama," said a child who had just brought two more rocks to put on the chimney.

"Oh," said Bessie Bell.

That lady who was the little girl's Mama looked much as all the ladies looked.

"Are all Ladies Mamas?" asked Bessie Bell.

She hoped the child who had brought the two rocks would not laugh, for Bessie Bell knew she would cry if she did.

The little girl did not laugh at all. She was trying so carefully to put the last rock on top of the stone chimney, she said: "No, Bessie Bell: some are Mamas, and some are only just Ladies."

There. There it was again: Only-Just-Ladies.

Bessie Bell wondered how to tell which were Mamas, and which were Ladies—just Ladies.

Very often after that day she watched those who passed the cabin where she and Sister Helen Vincula lived, and wondered which were Mamas—

And which were Ladies.

There was no rule of old or young by which Bessie Bell could tell.

Nor was it as one could tell Sisters from Just-Ladies by a way of dress. For Sisters, like Sister Helen Vincula, wore a soft white around the face, and soft long black veils, and a small cross on the breast of the dress: so that even had any not known the difference one could easily have guessed.

But for Ladies and Mamas there were none of these differences.

But Bessie Bell looked and looked and wondered, but her eyes brought to her no way of knowing.

Bessie Bell could at length think of only one way to find out the difference, and that was to ask—to let her ears help her eyes to bring to her some way of knowing.

One day, a dear old lady with white curls all around under her bonnet stopped near the playground and called Bessie Bell to her and gave her some chocolate candy, every piece of candy folded up in its own white paper.

Bessie Bell said: "Thank you, ma'am."

Then as the lady still stood by the playground Bessie Bell asked her: "Are you a Lady, ma'am?"

"I have been called so," said the lady, smiling down at Bessie Bell.

"Or are you a Mama?" asked Bessie Bell.

"Ah," said the lady; "I am a Mama, too, but all my little girls have grown up and left me."

Bessie Bell wondered how they could have done that, those little girls. But she saw, and was so glad to see, that this lady was very wise, and that she understood all the things that little girls wonder about.

But though there was a difference, a very great difference, between Mamas and Ladies it was very hard to tell—unless you asked.

One day a large fat lady took Bessie Bell on her lap. That was very strange to Bessie Bell—to sit on top of anybody.

And the lady made a rabbit, and a pony, and a preacher, all out of a handkerchief and her nice fat fingers. And then she made with the same handkerchief and fingers a Mama holding a Baby.

Then Bessie Bell looked up at her with her wondering eyes and asked: "Are you a Lady—"

"Bless my soul!" cried the lady. "Do you hear this child? And now, come to think of it, I don't know whether I am a lady or not—"

And the lady laughed until Bessie Bell felt quite shaken up.

"Or are you a Mama?" asked Bessie Bell, when it seemed that the lady was about to stop laughing.

"So that is it?" asked the lady, and she seemed about to begin laughing again.

"Yes, I am a Mama, and I have three little girls about as funny as you are."

Another time a lady passed by the cabin where Bessie Bell stood leaning against the little fluted white post of the gallery, and said:

"Good morning, Bessie Bell. I am Alice's Mama."

That made things so simple, thought Bessie Bell. This lady was a Mama. And she was Alice's Mama.

Bessie Bell wished that all would tell in that nice way at once whether they were Mamas or Just-Ladies.

The next lady who passed by the cabin also stopped to talk to Bessie Bell.

And Bessie Bell asked: "Are you a Mama or Only-Just-A-Lady?"

"I am only just a lady," the lady said, patting Bessie Bell's little tiny hand. And it was easy to see that, in Bessie Bell's mind, though Only-Just-Ladies were kind and sweet, Mamas were far greater and more important beings.

One night, when Sister Helen Vincula had put Bessie Bell to bed in the small bed that was not a crib-bed, though like that she had slept in before she had come to the high mountain, Bessie Bell still lay wide awake.

Her blue eyes were wide open and both of her pink little hands were above her head on the pillow. She was thinking, and thinking, and she forgot that she was thinking her thinking aloud, and she said:

"Alice has a Mama. Robbie has a Mama. Katie has a mama. Where is Bessie Bell's mama? Never mind: Bessie Bell will find a mama."

Then Sister Helen Vincula, who was wide awake, too, said:

"Ah me, ah me."

Bessie Bell said: "Sister Helen Vincula, did you call me?"

Sister Helen Vincula said: "No, child: go to sleep."

LIFE

Strong, leonine, laid out along the sand,
The Sphinx, with face perfect as Nilus flower,
Subtile lips, fresh as rosebuds in a shower;
Yet her years more than man's knowledge hath spanned—
Ancient, alluring, love-inspiring, grand—
Charming men ever with mysterious power,
Uttering wondrous riddles hour by hour,
In simple wisdom tangling all the land:

So Life lies stretched along the sands of time.

Eyes old as wisdom in her blossom face—
Each man's adored one e'en till he must die—
And, lo, she asks in mellow, mystic rhyme
Enigmas of the passing human race—
Fretting us with her riddles: Whence? How? Why?

POESY

It is a subtile breath that blows through verse,
A thing too fine and delicate to name,
As faint as are the dreams that dawns disperse—
Yet this the buoyant breath that blows to fame.

ALABAMA DAISIES

Fresh Alabama daisies, blue and bright,
With heaven's hue upon their petals set,
Gold of the sun and blue of sky well met—
These shall for me be symbol of life—light
With all the wealth of heaven, yet bedight
With earth's virescent livery, warm, dew-wet,
Caught close to earth by fresh green grasses' net—
Blue eyes upturned to the loftiest height.
So Life be bright, though in secluded ways,
As this small circlet, full as circled morn:
So, too, my life, look ever up and on,
Lifting unadumt eyes to heaven's rays,
Nor failing all the while earth to adorn—
A gracious, unmarred memory when gone.

THE RED-WINGED BLACK-BIRD

Gay little whistler in the tree,
Blowing a bugle: "Tu-ru-lee—"
Wearing epaulets rosy red,
Dapper cap on his saucy head:

He was a soldier once—My word!
Gay little bugler, brisk Black-Bird;
His wars are over, and peace is so sweet
Still at evening he blows: Retreat!

AN EASTER DAWN

Like some vast cosmic egg, a Day
Breaks on the crystal rim of Time:
A golden ball it does display
Wrapped in a morn as white as rime.

A WINTER DAWN

Two hours space the battle raged—
 The hosts of Day and Dark engaged—
 Till blanched the forces of the Night
 Before the Morning's spears of light.

THE PROPOSAL

A very shy fellow was dusky Sam,
 As slow of speech as the typical clam.
 He couldn't make love to his Angeline
 Though his love grew like the Great Gourd Vine

 To assist in wooing the chosen maid:
 "Miss Angeline? Dat you?" called he.
 "Yas.—Dis Angeline—Dis me—"
 "I—des wanten say—dat I does—love you—Miss Angeline—does you love me, too—?"
 "Why—yas—Of course I loves my beau—Say. What's de reason you wants to know?"
 "Miss—hold de wire—Will you marry me? True—?"
 "Yas. Course I will—Say. Who is you?"

For to take his arm from around yo' waist—"
"Tell him yo'se'f," say Lu; "dat nigger he

And lemme marry on dem all de same.

De nex' in line is de Bob-Quality—
And de fine ole Quality—Whar is dee?

STARK YOUNG

[1881—]

ROBERT ADGER LAW

STARK YOUNG, one of the most promising among present-day Southern poets, was born in Como, Mississippi, October 11, 1881. His father is Alfred Alexander Young, now a practicing physician in Oxford, Mississippi, and his mother, who died during Stark Young's childhood, was, before her marriage, Mary Stark. The family is of Scotch-Irish descent.

Mr. Young's boyhood in Como passed without special incident. He attended public and private schools in the village and studied with a view to a college education. In 1895 the family moved to Oxford, Mississippi, where the State University is located. Two years later, before he had reached his sixteenth birthday, Stark Young became a student of that institution.

During his university course Mr. Young showed a decided bent toward literature, though not especially toward poetry. He was editor-in-chief of the college annual, and also served as one of the editors of the Magazine. For certain work in early English he won the prize offered by the Early English Text Society of London. At the same time he took care not to give undivided attention to his studies or his literary work. He was interested in practically all phases of college life, and for his Greek letter fraternity, the Sigma Chi, he possessed an enthusiasm which has not yet died away. In 1901 he was graduated from the University of Mississippi with the A.B. degree.

In the autumn of the same year Mr. Young went to New York to enter the graduate school of Columbia University, from which he received the Master of Arts degree in 1902. But the year in the metropolitan city meant much to him outside of his collegiate labors. Coming from a small college town in a remote district of the South to the never-ceasing whirl of New York; becoming acquainted with certain teachers of literature like Brander Matthews, William P. Trent, G. R. Carpenter, and J. E. Spingarn; and through their personal interest being brought into certain literary and artistic circles formed by the select of the great city, his intellectual horizon was rapidly broadened and his poetic impulses were stirred. Many of his shorter poems were written at this time or are a reflection of his life at this period.

Believing that what talent he possessed lay in the field of literature, he next essayed the task assumed by so many other ambitious young writers, of journalistic work in the metropolis. After a few months of the usual unremitting and unsatisfying labor, however, he gave up the trial and went to a cabin camp in the North Carolina mountains. His experience there corresponds to what, in a mystic's life, is denominated as a period of prayer and meditation. By this time Mr. Young had become thoroughly convinced that his true vocation was to be that of a poet, and he went about to prepare himself for this profession by the study of such varied masters as Catullus, Malory, Spenser, and Matthew Arnold. One night in camp appears in these lines:

"The log burns low and bluishly,
And shadows from the rafters' gloom
Into the corner crannies hie,
And haunt the open of my room.
The flickering hearth-flames fall and leap,
Slow dropping round the eaves of sleep
The rain falls silently."

This devotion to the study of his art is typical of the man. Since then he has never renounced his calling.

With this same plan in view Mr. Young in 1903 went abroad, traveling mainly in Italy and in England, which countries he has visited in two subsequent years. Many weeks he spent in Fiesole, the suburb of Florence, so closely associated with the Brownings, and afterward journeyed through Tintagel in Cornwall, famous in Arthurian legend and beautiful in itself. Soon after his return to America he went to teach in his alma mater as assistant in rhetoric and composition.

Professor David Horace Bishop, to whose intimate personal friendship and discriminating criticism Mr. Young's poetry owes a great deal, was called to the chair of English in the University of Mississippi at the same time, so that Mr. Young worked for three years under his immediate direction. Meeting with success in his class-room, the younger instructor next year was given more congenial work in teaching literature. In October, 1907, he was elected instructor in English in the University of Texas at Austin, which position he still holds. As a teacher he has met with unusual success, inspiring in his students a genuine love for the best in literature, whether in the form of prose or poetry. One feels in his presence and in all that he does, his sense of good taste, and his sincere appreciation of the beautiful, not only in literature but in all art. His strong personality attracts many friends and holds them. Though he is not, like many versifiers, ashamed of his poetic gifts, those who know him best recognize at the same time his possession of unusually sound judgment and uncommon executive ability. His skill in the direction of a students' dramatic club has won general acknowledgment. To have achieved what he has done before completing his twenty-eighth year augurs well for the future.

Mr. Young's published work lies chiefly in two volumes, 'The Blind Man at the Window,' a collection of miscellaneous short poems, and 'Guenevere,' a five-act Arthurian drama in blank verse. Others of his short poems have been printed in magazines, and he is constantly writing more which he does not seek to print. Another play still in manuscript, 'Madretta,' deserves special notice.

'The Blind Man at the Window' discloses its author as distinctly a scholar in verse, and a scholar of broader and deeper learning than has been found at all frequently in the annals of Southern literature. Herein lies both the strength and the weakness of Mr. Young's verse. His lines are polished and rarely fall below a certain high level. His interests are extremely broad, touching not only the life of several distinct sections of America, but that of Europe as well. He shows plainly the influence of Malory, of Coleridge, of Keats, of Tennyson, of Browning, and many other great poets, in thought and in phrasing. Besides, a casual turning of the pages sufficiently indicates experimentation in various metrical forms—blank verse, the sonnet diversely rhymed, the simple ballad meter, the iambic tetrameter in couplets, the triolet. These facts clearly point to a larger grasp of the poet's technique and a wider intellectual vision than have been given to almost any other poet distinctly belonging to the South. At the same time one feels genuine passion striving for expression in scarcely any of these poems. There is lacking in them the vigor, the spontaneity, and the strong individuality that may be felt in cruder verse. Much of this is undoubtedly due to long continued closet study without a large experience of the vicissitudes of actual life.

To classify the poems, about sixty all told, in the collection under review, is a difficult matter, especially since the principle on which they are arranged is not easily visible. A large number of them are pure lyrics, sounding a note distinctly recollective of Tennyson's earlier verse. Many of these contain no striking thought, but merely suggest a passing mood. Such, for example, is the "Hamlet," printed below. These lines carry in them no important message, nor are they intended to convey any novel interpretation of the most frequently discussed character in English literature, but in themselves they do possess unusual melody in the combination of vowel sounds. Of the same type is another Tennysonian "Song," which closes with the lines:

"My lady with her yellow hair
Is in her dark grave lying.
And I'll go weep and tune my lute
To the winter wind's drear crying."

Here, again, one must acknowledge a conventional theme, with possibly an over-conscious simplicity of phrasing, but the melody is genuine. Similar in nature are certain ballads found in another part of the volume mentioned—"The Ballad of My Lady Jehanne," "Ballad of the Round Table," "The Ballad of the Bells of Boscastle," "The Bairn," and "Gordia." Here most readers will think they discern the influence of Keats and Coleridge rather than that of the older folk ballads. To the present critic Mr. Young's art appeals more strongly in this group of poems than anywhere else in the volume. His lyric gifts have full play, and the simple narrative style shuts out the moral element that sometimes clogs his poetic expression. "Gordia" is the best example of this class of poems, perhaps the most artistic piece of work in the book. A few lines may be quoted:

"The fishers on the lone dun sand
Will never see his figure looming,
The moon, it riseth on the strand,
The great waves booming, booming!

"It was an idle, weary day.
Their dim-flared lanthorns with them bringing,
Homeward they turn them one by one,
'Jesu pity him,' they say,
'For this with her wild, witch's singing
Gordia hath done.'"

The subtle suggestion of the supernatural in the verse, and the dramatic close, make it effective.

Other poems in this collection bring out Mr. Young's attitude toward friendship, toward bits of rural scenery in Mississippi and Cornwall, toward Spenser and the Elizabethans. Distinctly personal are "To My Sister" and "Written at My Mother's Grave." Still others contain philosophical reflections on present and future life, while the "Ode in Mississippi's Troubled Hour," is a too little restrained presentation of the opinion of many Southerners on the negro question. In this last poem, especially, Mr. Young is out of his proper habitat. His temperament is not that of the logical reasoner, and hardly fits him for the utterance of profound sentiments connected with philosophical or social problems. Consequently his musings on such subjects will fail to grip most of his readers. But one must recognize in these poems, as in all his work, the qualities of frankness and utter sincerity, together with a desire to experiment with all types of poesy until his own best medium of utterance is made clear.

The poetic drama of 'Guenevere' needs no lengthy treatment. Aside from the poetic nature of the drama, one is chiefly interested in the character of Guenevere, who is best portrayed in her own words:

"Would God had either made us as we yearn to be Or else had made us as we are without the yearning."

The theme of the play is the strife between flesh and spirit, in which the spirit is finally victorious.

In the unpublished 'Madretta' we have practically the same theme in a far different setting. The intensely spiritual heroine finds little response to her nature in that of her husband, and is tempted to flee to "Nouvelle Orléans" with an adventurer. Fortunately she checks herself in time, and the tragic ending of the play really marks a victory for the things of the spirit.

To pass judgment upon the work of a living writer, and to estimate his rank is a hazardous proceeding. At this time a critic cannot speak with certainty as to Mr. Young's final standing among Southern poets. But one conclusion will be reached by all those who know and admire his verse; that he has not yet reached maturity. Taking into account what he has done, the seriousness with which he regards his task, his opportunities of education and travel, his increasing desire to gain technique, his persistent striving for the ideal, one is led to hope for much whenever the full fruition shall come.

HAMLET

From 'The Blind Man at the Window.' Copyright, by Stark Young, and used here by permission of the author.

Drearily, drearily over the world
Sailleth the silver moon,
Wearily, wearily waves uphurled
Around the sallow dune
Lap in the spaces where shadows flee
Breaking the silences born of the sea.

A dreamer of dreams enhungered sate,
And bared his soul like an olden harp,
While steadily blew the winds of Fate,
Blew unceasingly bleak and sharp
Over the strings of his harp.

LAST LEAVES

From 'The Blind Man at the Window.'

When I pass out
Let me not be a broken leaf that dies
And falls at night down through the inmost gloom,
But catch the colour of the evening skies
And drift out on the after-glow and bloom
As I pass out.

WRITTEN AT MY MOTHER'S GRAVE

From 'The Blind Man at the Window.'

It was in the early spring you fell asleep,
For I brought violets to your dear hands
Next day when they had laid you in the still Dark room. And now from travelling many lands,
From many a stranger shore of level sands,
Made musical with waves, I come to fill
My weary eyes with my own native scene.

And now once more the spring brings everywhere
The warm south wind, these quiet trees are green,
And all along the ancient graveyard wall,
Amid the tangled sedge, the daisies bear
Their crowding stars. So all the memories
I have of you are green and fresh and pure,
Of that sweet childhood season when the flower
Blows fair, ere petals fall and the mature
Flesh-fruit of manhood, ripening to its hour
Cumbers the plant. Listen! the dove's voice
In the distant brake sounding her sad pain,
Sadly I hear, and in her mournful note
I catch the measure of my sorrow's strain.

Had I but had you longer, mother, then
Haply my hours and deeds should miss you more,
But then my heart should have you always near,
Having your words and ways heaped up in store,
Sweet company for many a weary year.
Such as I have are but the clambering
Upon your patient knees to kiss your lips,
Or look long in your blue eyes wondering,
Or put the dark hair from your gentle brow,
Feeling a wondrous sweetness steal somehow
From out your hands through all my little frame.
Once I remember, when my terrier died,
Through all the long stretches of the night I cried,
And when at last I slept, they say I fell
A moaning in my childish sleep; but you
Closed not your eyes, but held me always well
Pressed into your heart and kissed my face
As a mother can. And then the swift years flew,
Seating grim manhood in the innocent place,
And many-mouthed cares are knocking at the gate,
Yet though I have no comforter so strong,
I would not call you from your well-won peace,
From the sweet silence of rich death. The wrong
Men did upon your shoulders heavy sat,
Your summer of goodness had too full increase
And brought an early harvest of your life.

Would call? What mummerly! Too well I know
That those we love and those we hate must go,
Down the dim avenues of death must pass,
Out to the fields of the great forever—lo,
Are gone from us like shadows on the grass
To the dark region of their last abode.

The Mississippi hills are blue and faint,
The air grows stiller and the sounds more sweet,
The gray shades cluster round each marble saint,
And in the long box walks the shadows meet.
And on your grave, rich-ripe with golden days,
Nasturtium cups are lit with level rays
From the low-sunk sun. Still would I be a child,
And come with flowers here for your dear praise,
And with Good morrow, Mother, pause to tell
The marvels of the day—nay, nay, I know,
I only fancy, mother, ere I go
To say Farewell forever, and farewell.

SONNET

From 'The Blind Man at the Window.'

I saw a blind man at his window sitting
At dusk, and always his poor eager face
Turned upward where the sweepers voiced the space
And rustled all the dim air with their flitting.
He could not see the wind move o'er the ground,
Nor the faint yellow light upon the hill,
But only leaned his poor hands on the sill
To draw the lovely evening from the sound.
Dear God, within this window to the sky,
From shadowed chamber of our life we watch,
Likewise eager and blind, and haply catch
Now airy strain or angel wing brushed by,
Or silence rich from the glory of thy day,
And, sightless, only hear and feel and pray.

LOVE AND SLEEP

From 'The Blind Man at the Window.'

A silent castle on a gloaming hill,
Dark cypresses against a sky that fades,
And drowsy homing birds that circling fill
The air with wings, from out the shades
Chirps and low flutterings and the stir of leaves,
The droning choir of flies above the moat,
Dull-dropping water and a pasture bell,
Lone calling dove with sorrow-laden throat,
I thought on all, but sleep wrought not her spell.
Then came a blank before mine eyes, aflight,
And lo! I saw a fairer land, the moon,
Watched o'er a pathless sky of summer night,
And one sang softly that the hills did swoon,
And drew her near and smiled and beckoned me—
And then I knew I slept and dreamed of thee.

THE MOTHER

From 'The Blind Man at the Window.'

The sick mother sat at her window singing,
Rockaby, sing rockaby,
And the long day closed and the dark came bringing Night and dun sky.

She bent her poor arms where he had lain
And fancied she saw him, and sang her song,
Sleep, little one, but never again
Her voice shall reach him, dead so long.

Lower and lower she bent her head,
Rockaby baby, when the winds blow,
Over her poor vacant arms, and said,
"Mother is with you," faint and low.

And the years went back without spot or stain,
All the long years since she lost her child,
And peace came after long grief and pain,
And her still lips smiled.

And when she was dead some little space,
They found her and wept, till the moonlight fell
Upon the glory of her face,
"Dear God," they said, "'tis well, 'tis well."

SONNET

From 'The Blind Man at the Window.'

It is a solace of mine own, dear friend,
That in thine absences I have thee still.
No red sun sinks behind the wooded hill,
No pale moon rises in the eastern bend,
But I must look and question in the end
If thou too lookest from thy window sill,
And let'st that same old human hunger fill Thy heart. No low-sung evening songs but send Mine ear alistening for thy voice to ring.
To all my journeys among books I bring
Thy thoughts and words that I be not alone.
So shall I have thee most when thou art gone,
When speech nor glance nor motion break the free,
Deep-moving converse that I hold with thee.

MEDITATION

From 'Guenevere.' Copyright, by Stark Young, and used here by permission of the author.

He that is wise doth choose the thoughtful life
As a clever woman findeth the right color.
Long is the night to him that cannot sleep,
Long is the journey to the weary man,
And long is the span of life to the foolish. Take
Some quiet hour at sundown in some peaceful
Place, and look about the vineyard
Of thy soul. The moon is silver clear by night,
The water glimmers in the sun, but be
Thou shining in thy meditation.

ON A DISAPPOINTING FRIENDSHIP

Hitherto unpublished.

Within the orchard plot I found
High on a bough an apple fair
That seemed of all most sweet and sound.
With zest I tried to reach it there,
And hoped to bring it down to me;
And striving hard, I made it fall.
I snatched it up, me hercule,
A rotten pippin after all!

STANZAS

Hitherto unpublished.

How distant seems the hour when did pass
The autumn glory west from land to sky,
And in the falling sun the plummy grass
Powdered the hill with light. Now day doth die,
Save where yon summit still the sun holds high,
Celestial pharos in a dark lagoon.
Dimness is all. The sky doth draw more nigh
Unto its marriage with the land, and soon
All faint, appear the lone star and the hornèd moon.

And lo from the east comes night the sower, swift,
Bending his steps across the azure mead,
Flings with wide motion from his palm uplift
Upon the enamelled void the starry seed,
Like golden corn about his footsteps lead.
Who counteth them? Unnumbered—as a rain
Dropped within some vale with silent speed,
Stars sown in whirlwinds, that all search is vain,
Our eyes but seem to lose, and find, and lose again.

And sudden from a dim world drawing near,
Among the rest a meteor sprung now,
Bolder than all, like some fierce charioteer
With hair blown backward from his burning brow,

Shoots through the course of heaven, now sinks low.
Hither from out the dark he came and on
Into the dark he went—I know not how,
Nor mid what starry coursers sets his sun,
Nor what bright goal awaits him when his race is run.

THE ALAMO

Is then Thermopylæ come from the shade
Of ancient death and grand oblivion?
Ere dawn they charge. Stand, little garrison!
On, fail not God and Texas! They have made
The wall—hold then your church and carronade.
The loop-holes flame, the aqueducts will run
Crimson with blood—ye fight a score with one.
The smoke dies down, your glory cannot fade.
The rising sun finds death and silence there.
Beside the wall Travis lies slain, and nigh
The chapel glorious Crockett, fallen among
The hostile carnage and our few. Hear,
O Mexico! This is no victory,
For from these veins are wells of freedom sprung!

THE GARDEN OF PSYCHE

Dim delightful gardens lie
In the regions of the air,
But rainbow visions smile and die,
And who hath found a place so fair,
Found a garden half so sweet
As sweet Psyche's cool retreat?

Ah, Psyche, still I hear thee sing,
Sweet Psyche of the golden throat!
The venom'd years have lost their sting,
Remembering thy note.
Thou art Beauty's only mate,
Together ye do keep the gate,
The garden of the soul divine,
Ah, may I keep that garden mine!

Then while I paused amid the sighing strings,
A vaporous silver filled the leafy way
Where Psyche stood, and from behind, her wings
Shimmered like dawn upon a virgin spray.
It was the hour of day and the sweet season
When love and gentle thought fills up the reason;
The rosy meadows wait the starry light,
The whitlow grass, like snowflakes on the hill,
Stirs not a flower; and Earth lies rapt and still,
Dreaming the soft majesty of night.

Slowly she came along the twilight path:
"I know the world lies heavy on thy heart
And man's short aim hath tired thine eye, and hath
Made thee despise the archer with the dart.
The garden of the soul may soothe thy mind,
And where thou wilt that garden thou mayst find.
Speak then thy case. My God hath fashioned me
So that I am not touched by this desire,
And from the place to which thou dost aspire,
I come, that I may lend myself to thee."

"Though yet," I said, "day goeth after day,
And men go blindly forth to reap and sow,
Think not I hold their labours cast away,
Or theirs a petty harvest—well I know
Each stroke and every deed must find somehow
Its place in the end, that every weary brow
Sweats to some purpose in the evolving plan.
Yet from the struggle must I turn my face,
Men have forgot the goal to love the race,
The world becomes the master of the man.

"Thou knowest I cannot set to little themes,
Sprung though they be from out the common heart,
True, haply, but yet momentary gleams,
And often smacking somewhat of the mart.
Busy me not with passions of a day,
Give me to climb where godlike rule hath sway,

Give me to wrench the torch from their high might!
What though I fail, yet shall I feel no fear,
Seeing that then the garment I may wear
That on the last grand day will be so bright.

"Certain, O Psyche, certain hath the wind
Brought to me rumours of some Presence here,
The friendly stars assure me and unbind
From round my heart the doubt and weary fear.
Dear is the thought of little wings whose flight
Returneth to my eaves: and in the night
To hear amid the grass a moment's stir
Warmeth in me a spark of brother love,
Knowing some kindred atomy doth move
Whose tiny life enacts a worshipper.

"Yet sometimes how I weary of the load!
Is it not hard, O Soul, that I should feel
The loneliness in Poesy's abode?
From common walks I hear the laughter peal—
They are good men, yet wherefore should they tread,
Careless and free the path where some have bled?"
And Psyche answered, "Yea, line after line
They gather happy fruit unto the shore
Where ends life's orchard—thou hast that and more,
The flower and the sweet they too are thine.

"Beauty and thou mayst walk together
And she instill into thy mind
Fresh secrets of the wind and weather,
The burden of the singing wind.
And she shall woo thy roving eye
With gleams of her divinity:
The halo round the cactus' leaf,
And pale primroses dewy cool,
The mosses hung above the pool
With swing and shadow on the reef.

"She spreads her veils along the lawn,
And out beyond the bowered trees
Her robe across the heaven drawn
Glows soft and tender promises.

The moonlight on those eyelids lies
Where she doth dream of Paradise.
And she is thine, her going hence,
Her nearing hand is thine to reach,
Man knoweth naught but she might teach,
She is God's breath upon the sense.

"God's smile is turned to thee. To Him doth burn
The sunset on the altar of the earth;
The organ wind is His; and grim and stern,
His hand on their wet manes, with rein and girth,
He holds the plunging horses of the sea.
The sovran lord of lordly death is He;
The wave the general flood doth yield unto,
The flying leaf to the wind, light unto dark,
And man to death—beat upward like the lark,
Let God drink up thy soul as sun doth dew!

"Stretch forth the wings of thine eyes till they do cleave
The viewless pole, and gazing thou shalt see
A one-day's shadow that will pass and leave
Whiter than day thy soul's infinity.
Thy flame is but a spark struck from the whole,
Thy body but a shadow on thy soul,
Thy flesh is but a crucible where lie
Obscured and mingled ores of good and sin,
And on it plays the purging fire wherein Thy life is changed to immortality."

While she made end, the round moon rising bright
Entered the listening wood, and every breeze
Was hushed, and lo!—where she had stood, the light
Hung like a silver mist among the trees.
